

UNIVERSITY OF PITTSBURGH LIBRARY

THIS BOOK PRESENTED BY Katherine C. Smith

• • • ۱., , · •

Thuff Smith, 14the Wand Potts brugh. Rob Langolow. A N

ENQUIRY

CONCERNING

POLITICAL JUSTICE,

AND

ITS INFLUENCE

ΟN

GENERAL VIRTUE AND HAPPINESS.

BY WILLIAM GODWIN.

IN TWO VOLUMES

VOL. II.

L O N D O N:

PRINTED FOR G. G. J. AND J. ROBINSON, PATERNOSTER-ROW.

M.DCC.XCHI.

C O N T E N T S

OF THE # SECOND VOLUME.

BOOK V.

OF LEGISLATIVE AND EXECUTIVE POWER.

BOOK VI.

OF OPINION CONSIDERED AS A SUBJECT OF POLITICAL INSTITUTION.

BOOK VII.

OF CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS.

BOOK VIII.

OF PROPERTY.

z

OFTHE

FIFTH BOOK.

OF LEGISLATIVE AND EXECUTIVE POWER.

CHAP. I.

INTRODUCTION.

RETROSPECT of principles already established.—Distribution of the remaining subjects.—Subject of the present book.— Forms of government.— Method of examination to be adopted. Page 379

CHAP. II.

OF EDUCATION, THE EDUCATION OF A PRINCE.

Nature of monarchy delineated.—School of adversity.—Tendency of superfluity to inspire effeminacy—to deprive us of the benefit of experience.—Illustrated in the case of princes.—Manner in which they are addressed.—Inefficacy of the instruction bestowed upon them. 383

b 2

CHAP.

CHAP. III.

PKIVATE LIFE OF A PRINCE.

Principles by which he is influenced—irrefponfibility—impatience of control—habits of diffipation—ignorance—diflike of truth—diflike of juftice.—Pitiable fituation of princes. Page 397

CHAP. IV.

OF A VIRTUOUS DESPOTISM.

Supposed excellence of this form of government controverted—from the narrowness of human powers.—Case of a vicious administration—of a virtuous administration intended to be formed.—Monarchy not adapted to the government of large states. 408

CHAP. V.

OF COURTS AND MINISTERS.

Systematical monopoly of confidence.—CharaEter of ministers—of their dependents.—Venality of courts.—Universality of this principle.

414

CHAP. VI.

OF SUBJECTS.

Monarchy founded in imposture.—Kings not entitled to fuperiority inadequate to the functions they posses.—Means by which the imposses of the imposses of the imposses of the imposses of the impose of the imposed of the impose of the imposed of the impose of the impose of the impose of the impose of the imposed of the impose of the imposed of the impo posture generates—1. indifference to merit—2. indifference to truth —3. artificial desires—4. pussillanimity.—Moral incredulity of monarchical countries.—Injustice of luxury—of the inordinate admiration of wealth. Page 423

CHAP. VII.

OF ELECTIVE MONARCHY.

Diforders attendant on fuch an election.—Election is intended either to provide a man of great or of moderate talents.—Confequences of the firft—of the fecond,—Can elective and hereditary monarchy be combined? 435

C H A P. VIII.

OF LIMITED MONARCHY.

Liable to most of the preceding objections—to farther objections peculiar to itself.—Responsibility considered.—Maxim, that the king can do no wrong.—Functions of a limited monarch.—Impossibility of maintaining the neutrality required.—Of the difinission of ministers. —Responsibility of ministers—Appointment of ministers, its importance—its difficulties.—Recapitulation.—Strength and weakness of the human species. 441

CHAP. IX.

OF A PRESIDENT WITH REGAL POWERS.

Enumeration of powers—that of appointing to inferior offices—of pardoning offences—of convoking deliberative affemblies—of affixing

ing a veto to their decrees.—Conclusion.—The title of king estimated.—Monarchical and aristocratical systems, similarity of their effects. Page 454

CHAP. X.

OF HEREDITARY DISTINCTION.

Birth confidered as a phyfical caufe—as a moral caufe.—Ariftocratical effimate of the human species.—Education of the great.— Recapitulation. 461

CHAP. XI.

MORAL EFFECTS OF ARISTOCRACY.

Importance of practical justice.—Species of injustice which aristocracy creates.—Estimate of the injury produced.—Examples. 468

CHAP. XII.

OF TITLES.

Their origin and hiftory.—Their miferable abfurdity.—Truth the only adequate reward of merit. 474

CHAP. XIII.

OF THE ARISTOCRATICAL CHARACTER.

Intolerance of ariflocracy—dependent for its fuccefs upon the ignorance of the multitude.—Precautions neceffary for its fupport.—Different kinds of ariflocracy.—Ariflocracy of the Romans : its virtues —its -its vices.—Ariflocratical distribution of property—regulations by which it is maintained—avarice it engenders.—Argument against innovation from the present happy establishment of affairs confidered.—Conclusion. Page 478

CHAP. XIV.

GENERAL FEATURES OF DEMOCRACY.

Definition.—Supposed evils of this form of government—ascendancy of the ignorant—of the crafty—inconstancy—rash considence groundless suspicion.—Merits and defects of democracy compared. —Its moral tendency.—Tendency of truth.—Representation. 489

CHAP. XV.

OF POLITICAL IMPOSTURE.

Importance of this topic.—Example in the doctrine of eternal punifiment.—Its inutility argued—from hiftory—from the nature of mind.—Second example: the religious fanction of a legiflative fyftem.—This idea is, 1. in firict conftruction impracticable—2, injurious.—Third example: principle of political order.—Vice has no effential advantage over virtue.—Impoflure unneceffary to the caufe of juffice—not adapted to the nature of man. 499

CHAP. XVI.

OF THE CAUSES OF WAR.

Offensive war contrary to the nature of democracy.—Defensive war exceedingly rare.—Erroneousness of the ideas commonly annexed to 2 the the phrafe, our country.—Nature of war delineated.—Infufficient caufes of war—the acquiring a healthful and vigorous tone to the public mind—the putting a termination upon private infults—the menaces or preparations of our neighbours—the dangerous confequences of conceffion.—Two legitimate caufes of war. Page 511

CHAP. XVII.

OF THE OBJECT OF WAR.

The repelling an invader.—Not reformation—not refiraint—not indemnification.—Nothing can be a fufficient object of war that is not a fufficient cause for beginning it.—Reflections on the balance of power. 521

CHAP. XVIII.

OF THE CONDUCT OF WAR.

Offensive operations.—Fortifications.—General action.—Stratagem. —Military contributions.—Capture of mercantile veffels.—Naval war.—Humanity.—Military obedience.—Foreign poffeffions. 526

CHAP. XIX.

OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENTS AND TREATIES.

A country may look for its defence either to a flanding army or an univerfal militia.—The former condemned.—The latter objected to as of immoral tendency—as unneceffary—either in refpect to courage—or difcipline.—Of a commander.—Of treaties. 534 C H A P.

CHAP. XX.

OF DEMOCRACY AS CONNECTED WITH THE TRANSACTIONS OF WAR.

External affairs are of fubordinate confideration.— Application.— Farther objections to democracy—1. it is incompatible with fecrecy —this proved to be an excellence—2. its movements are too flow— 3. too precipitate.—Evils of anarchy confidered. Page 542

CHAP. XXI.

OF THE COMPOSITION OF GOVERNMENT.

Houfes of alfembly.—This inflitution unjuft.—Deliberate proceeding the proper antidote.—Separation of legislative and executive power confidered.—Superior importance of the latter.—Functions of minisflers. 550

CHAP. XXII.

OF THE FUTURE HISTORY OF POLITICAL SOCIETIES.

Quantity of administration necessary to be maintained.—Objects of administration: national glory—rival/hip of nations.—Inferences: 1. complication of government unnecessary—2. extensive territory superfluous—3. constraint, its limitations.—Project of government: police—defence.

CHAP.

¢

CHAP. XXIII.

OF NATIONAL ASSEMBLIES.

They produce a fightious unanimity—an unnatural uniformity of opinion.—Caufes of this uniformity.—Confequences of the mode of decifion by vote—1. perversion of reason—2. contentious disputes —3. the triumph of ignorance and vice.—Society incapable of acting from itself—of being well conducted by others.—Conclusion. —Modification of democracy that results from these confiderations. Page 568

CHAP. XXIV.

OF THE DISSOLUTION OF GOVERNMENT. Political authority of a national affembly—of juries.—Confequence from the whole. 576

BOOK VI.

OF OPINION CONSIDERED AS A SUBJECT OF POLITICAL INSTITUTION.

CHAP. I.

GENERAL EFFECTS OF THE POLITICAL SUPERINTENDENCE OF OPINION.

Arguments in favour of this superintendence. Answer. The exertions of fociety in its corporate capacity are, 1. unwife-2. incapable of proper effect.-Of fumptuary laws, agrarian laws and rewards .- Political degeneracy not incurable .- 3. Superfluousin commerce-in speculative enquiry-in morality.-4. pernicious -as undermining intellectual capacity-as sufpending intellectual improvement-contrary to the nature of morality-to the nature of mind.-Conclusion. Page 581

CHAP. II.

OF RELIGIOUS ESTABLISHMENTS.

Their general tendency.-Effects on the clergy : they introduce, 1. implicit faith -2. hypocrify: topics by which an adherence to them is vindicated.-Effects on the laity.- Application. 603 CHAP.

c 2

CHAP. III.

OF THE SUPPRESSION OF ERRONEOUS OPINION IN RELIGION AND GOVERNMENT.

CHAP. IV.

OF TESTS.

Their supposed advantages are attended with injustice—are nugatory.—Illustration.—Their disadvantages—they enfnare — example—second example—they are an usurpation.—Influence of tests on the latitudinarian—on the purist.—Conclusion. 622

CHAP. V.

OF OATHS.

Oaths of office and duty.—Their abfurdity.—Their immoral confequences.—Oaths of evidence lefs atrocious.—Opinion of the liberal and and refolved refpecting them.—Their effential features: contempt of veracity—falfe morality.—Their particular ftructure.—Abfract principles affumed by them to be true.—Their inconfiftency with thefe principles. Page 631

CHAP. VI.

OF LIBELS.

Public libels.—Injuffice of an attempt to prefcribe the method in which public queftions shall be difcussed.—Its pussibilitanimity.—Invitations to tumult.—Private libels.—Reasons in favour of their being subjected to restraint.—Auswer.—1. It is necessary the truth should be told.—Salutary effects of the unrestrained investigation of character.—Objection: freedom of speech would be productive of calumny, not of justice.—Answer.—Future bistory of libel.— 2. It is necessary men should be taught to be sincere.—Extent of the evil which arises from a command to be infincere.—The mind spontaneously shrinks from the profecution of a libel.—Conclusion. 637

CHAP. VII.

OF CONSTITUTIONS.

Diffinction of regulations conflituent and legislative.—Supposed character of permanence that ought to be given to the former—inconfistent with the nature of man.—Source of the error.—Remark.— Abfurdity of the system of permanence.—Its futility.—Mode to be furfucd.

purfued in framing a conflicution.—Conflictment laws not more important than others.—In what manner the confent of the diffricts is to be declared.—Tendency of the principle which requires this confent.— It would reduce the number of conflictutional articles parcel out the legiflative power—and produce the gradual extinction of law.—Objection.—Anfwer. Page 652

CHAP. VIII.

OF NATIONAL EDUCATION.

Arguments in its favour.—Anfwer.—1. It produces permanence of opinion.—Nature of prejudice and judgment described.—2. It requires uniformity of operation.—3. It is the mirror and tool of national government.—The right of punishing not founded in the previous function of instructing. 665

CHAP. IX.

OF PENSIONS AND SALARIES.

Reafons by which they are vindicated.—Labour in its ufual acceptation and labour for the public compared.—Immoral effects of the inflitution of falaries.—Source from which they are derived.— Unneceffary for the fubfiftence of the public functionary—for dignity. Salaries of inferior officers—may alfo be fuperfeded.—Taxation.— Qualifications. 673

СНАР.

CHAP. X.

OF THE MODES OF DECIDING A QUESTION ON THE PART OF THE COMMUNITY.

Decifion by lot, its origin—founded in the fystem of discretionary rights—implies the defertion of duty.—Decision by ballot—inculcates timidity—and hypocrify.—Decision by vote, its recommendations. Page 683

BOOK VII.

OF CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS.

CHAP. I.

LIMITATIONS OF THE DOCTRINE OF PUNISHMENT WHICH RESULT FROM THE PRINCIPLES OF MORALITY.

Definition of punishment.—Nature of crime.—Retributive justice nos independent and absolute—not to be vindicated from the system of nature.—Defert a chimerical property.—Conclusion. 687

CHAP.

6

CHAP. II.

GENERAL DISADVANTAGES OF COERCION.

Conficience in matters of religion confidered—in the conduct of life.— Best practicable criterion of duty—not the decision of other men but of our own understanding.—Tendency of coercion.— Its various classes confidered. Page 696

CHAP. III.

OF THE PURPOSES OF COERCION.

Nature of defence confidered.—Coercion for reftraint—for reformation.—Supposed uses of adversity—defective—unnecessary.— Coercion for example—1. nugatory.—The necessary of political coercion arises from the defects of political institution.—2. unjust. —Unfeeling character of this species of coercion. 705

CHAP. IV.

OF THE APPLICATION OF COERCION.

Delinquency and coercion incommenfurable.—External action no proper fubject of criminal animadversion.—How far capable of proof.— Iniquity of this standard in a moral—and in a political view.— Propriety of a retribution to be measured by the intention of the offender considered.—Such a project would overturn criminal law —would abolish coercion.—Informability, 1. of motives.—Doubtfulness of history.—Declarations of sufferers.—2. of the future conduct conduct of the offender-uncertainty of evidence-either of the facts-or the intention.-Difadvantages of the defendant in a criminal fuit. Page 715

CHAP. V.

OF COERCION CONSIDERED AS A TEMPORARY EXPEDIENT.

Arguments in its favour.—Anfwer.—It cannot fit men for a better order of fociety.-The true remedy to private injustice describedis adapted to immediate practice.-Duty of the community in this respect.-Duty of individuals.-Illustration from the case of war -of individual defence. - Application. - Difadvantages of anarchy-want of fecurity-of progreffive enquiry.-Correspondent difadvantages of despotism.-Anarchy awakens, despotism depreffes the mind.-Final refult of anarchy-how determined.-Supposed purposes of coercion in a temporary view-reformation -example-restraint.-Conclusion. 727

CHAP. VI.

SCALE OF COERCION.

Its [phere defcribed.—Its [everal classes.—Death with torture.— Death absolutely.—Origin of this policy—in the corruptness of political institutions-in the inhumanity of the institutors.-Cor-> poral puniforment.—Its abfurdity.—Its atrociou/nefs.—Privation of freedom.—Duty of reforming our neighbour an inferior confiderad tion tion in this cafe.—Its place defined.—Modes of refiraint.—Indiferiminate imprisonment.—Solitary imprisonment.—Its severity. —Its nuoral effects.—Slavery.—Banishment.—1. Simple banishment.—2. Transportation.—3. Colonisation.—This project has miscarried from unkindness — from officious fress.—Its permanent evils.—Recapitulation. Page 745

CHAP. VII.

OF EVIDENCE.

Difficulties to which this fubject is liable—exemplified in the diftinction between overt actions and intentions.—Reafons against this diffinction.—Principle in which it is founded. 760-

CHAP. VIII.

OF LAW.

Arguments by which it is recommended. — Anfwer.—Law is, T. Endlefs—particularly in a free ftate.—Caufes of this difadvantage. —2. Uncertain.—Inflanced in queftions of property. — Mode in. which it must be fludied.—3. Pretends to foretel future events.— Laws are a fpecies of promifes—check the freedom of opinion are deftructive of the principles of reafon.—Difhonefly of lawyers. —An honefl lawyer mifchicvous.—Abolition of law vindicated on the fcore of wifdom—of candour—from the nature of man.— Future hiftory of political justice.—Errors that might arife in the commencement.—Its gradual progrefs.—Its effects on criminal law.—on property. 764:

CHAP. IX.

OF PARDONS.

Their absurdity.-Their origin.-Their abuses.-Their arbitrary character .- Destructive of morality. Page 781

BOOK VIII.

OF PROPERTY.

CHAP. I.

GENUINE SYSTEM OF PROPERTY DELINEATED.

Importance of this topic. Abuses to which it has been exposed. Criterion of property: justice.-Entitles each man to the supply of his animal wants as far as the general flock will afford itto the means of well being .- Estimate of luxury .- Its pernicious effects on the individual who partakes of it.-Idea of labour as the foundation of property confidered.-Its unreafonablenefs.-System of popular morality on this subject. - Defects of that system. 787 CHAP.

d 2

CHAP. II.

BENEFITS ARISING FROM THE GENUINE SYSTEM OF PROPERTY.

Contrasted with the mischiefs of the present system, as confisting—1. In a sense of dependence.—2. In the perpetual spectacle of injustice, leading men astray in their defires—and perverting the integrity of their judgments.—The rich are the true pensioners.—3. In the discouragement of intellectual attainments.—4. In the multiplication of vice—generating the crimes of the poor—the passions of the rich—and the misfortunes of war.—5. In depopulation. Page 799

CHAP. III.

OF THE OBJECTION TO THIS SYSTEM FROM THE ADMIRABLE EFFECTS OF LUXURY.

Nature of the objection.—Luxury not neceffary—either to population —or to the improvement of the mind.—Its true character. 8'14

CHAP. IV.

OF THE OBJECTION TO THIS SYSTEM FROM THE ALLUREMENTS OF SLOTH.

The objection flated.—Such a flate of fociety must have been preceded by great intellectual improvement.—The manual labour required in this flate will be extremely fmall.—Univerfality of the love of diffinction.—Operation of this motive under the fystem in question —will finally be fuperfeded by a better motive. 818

CHAP. V.

OF THE OBJECTION TO THIS SYSTEM FROM THE IMPOSSIBILITY OF ITS BEING RENDERED PERMANENT.

Grounds of the objection.-Its ferious import.-Anfwer.-The introduction of fuch a system must be owing, 1. to a deep fense of justice-2. to a clear infight into the nature of happines-as being properly intellectual-not confifting in fenfual pleafure-or the pleafures of delusion .- Influence of the passions confidered .--Men will not accumulate either from individual forefight-or from vanity. Page 820

CHAP. VI.

OF THE OBJECTION TO THIS SYSTEM FROM THE INFLEXIBILITY OF ITS RESTRICTIONS.

Nature of the objection .- Natural and moral independence diffinguished-the first beneficial-the second injurious .- Tendency of re-Arietion properly fo called.-The genuine fystem of property not a fystem of restrictions-does not require common labour, meals or magazines.-Such reftrictions abfurd-and unneceffary.-Evils of cooperation .- Its province may perpetually be diminified .-Manual labour may be extinguished .- Confequent activity of intellect.-Ideas of the future state of cooperation.-Its limits.-Its legitimate province.—Evils of cohabitation—and marriage.—They oppose the developement of our faculties-are inimical to our hap nefs .

happiness—and deprave our understandings.—Marriage a branch of the prevailing system of property.—Confequences of its abolition. —Education need not in that state of society be a subject of positive institution.—These principles do not lead to a sullen individuality —Partial attachments considered.—Benefits accruing from a just affection—materially promoted by these principles.—The genuine system of property does not prohibit accumulation—implies a certain degree of appropriation—and division of labour. Page 839

CHAP. VII.

OF THE OBJECTION TO THIS SYSTEM FROM THE PRINCIPLE OF POPULATION.

The objection stated.—Remoteness of its operation.—Conjectural ideas respecting the antidote.—Omnipotence of mind.—Illustrations.— Causes of decrepitude.—Youth is prolonged by chearfulness—by clearness of apprehension—and a benevolent character. — The powers we posses are essentially progressive.—Effects of attention. —The phenomenon of sleep explained.—Present utility of these reasonings.—Application to the future state of society. 860

CHAP. VIII.

OF THE MEANS OF INTRODUCING THE GENUINE SYSTEM OF PROPERTY.

Apprehensions that are entertained on this subject.—Idea of massare. —Inference we cught to make upon supposition of the reality of 2 these thefe apprehensions.—Mischief by no means the necessary attendant on improvement.—Duties under this circumstance, 1. Of those who are qualified for public instructors — temper—fincerity.— Pernicious effects of dissimulation in this case.—2. Of the rich and great.—Many of them may be expected to be advocates of equality. —Conduct which their interess a body prescribes.—3. Of the friends of equality in general.—Omnipotence of truth.—Importance of a mild and benevolent proceeding.—Connexion between liberty and equality.—Cause of equality will perpetually advance.—Symptoms of its progress—Idea of its future fuccess.—Conclusion. Page 87.3;

• • 0 -

• B

AN

E N O U I R Y

CONCERNING

POLITICAL JUSTICE.

BOOK V.

OF LEGISLATIVE AND EXECUTIVE POWER.

CHAP. I.

INTRODUCTION.

RETROSPECT OF PRINCIPLES ALREADY ESTABLISHED,-DISTRIBUTION OF THE REMAINING SUBJECTS .--- SUB-JECT OF THE PRESENT BOOK .- FORMS OF GOVERNMENT. --- METHOD OF EXAMINATION TO BE ADOPTED.

TN the preceding divisions of this work the ground has been fufficiently cleared to enable us to proceed with confiderable explicitnefs and fatisfaction to the practical detail of political in- principles alflitution. It has appeared that an enquiry concerning the prin-blifted. ciples and conduct of focial intercourfe is the moft important topic upon which the mind of man can be exercifed *; that upon those principles well or ill conceived, and the manner in which they are executed, the vices and virtues of individuals depend *;

BOOK V. CHAP. I. Retrofpect of ready efta-

* Book I. 3 C 2 that

OF LEGISLATIVE AND

BOOK V. CHAP. I.

380

that political inftitution to be good muft have its fole foundation in the rules of immutable juftice \*; and that those rules, uniform in their nature, are equally applicable to the whole human race  $\uparrow$ .

Diffribution of the remaining fubjects.

The different topics of political inflitution cannot perhaps be more perfpicuoufly diffributed than under the four following heads : provisions for general administration ; provisions for the intellectual and moral improvement of individuals; provisions for the administration of criminal justice; and provisions for the regulation of property. Under each of these heads it will be our bufinefs, in proportion as we adhere to the great and comprehenfive principles already established, rather to clear away abuses than to recommend farther and more precife regulations, rather to fimplify than to complicate. Above all we fhould not forget, that government is an evil, an ufurpation upon the private judgment and individual confcience of mankind; and that, however we may be obliged to admit it as a neceffary evil for the prefent. it behoves us, as the friends of reafon and the human fpecies. to admit as little of it as poffible, and carefully to obferve whether. in confequence of the gradual illumination of the human mind. that little may not hereafter be diminished.

Subject of the prefent book. And first we are to confider the different provisions that may be made for general administration; including under the phrase > * Book II, Chap. II. + Book I, Chap. VII, VIII. Book III, Chap. VII.

> > general

general administration all that shall be found necessary of what has ufually been denominated legiflative and executive power. Legiflation has already appeared to be a term not applicable to human fociety*. Men cannot do more than declare and interpret law; nor can there be an authority fo paramount, as to have the prerogative of making that to be law, which abftract and immutable juffice had not made to be law previously to that interposition. But it might notwithftanding this be found neceffary, that there fhould be an authority empowered to declare those general principles, by which the equity of the community will be regulated, in particular cafes upon which it may be compelled to decide. The queftion concerning the reality and extent of this neceffity it is proper to referve for after confideration. Executive power confifts of two very diffinct parts : general deliberations relative to particular emergencies, which, fo far as practicability is concerned, may be exercifed either by one individual or a body of individuals, fuch as peace and war, taxation †, and the felection of proper periods for convoking deliberative affemblies: and particular functions, fuch as those of financial detail, or minute fuperintendence, which cannot be exercifed unlefs by one or at moft by a fmall number of perfons.

In reviewing these leveral branches of authority, and confider- Forms of going the perfons to whom they may be most properly confided, we vernment.

+ I flate the article of taxation as a branch of executive government, fince it is not, like law or the declaration of law, a promulgating of fome general principle, but is a temporary regulation for fome particular emergence.

BOOK V. CHAP. I.

* Book III, Chap. V.

OF LEGISLATIVE AND EXECUTIVE POWER.

BOOK V. CHAP. I. Method of examination to be adopted.

382

cannot do better than adopt the ordinary diffribution of forms of government into monarchy, ariftocracy and democracy. Under each of thefe heads we may enquire into the merits of their refpective principles, first abfolutely, and upon the hypothesis of their standing fingly for the whole administration; and secondly, in a limited view, upon the supposition of their conflicting one branch only of the system of government. It is usually alike incident to them all to confide the minuter branches of executive detail to inferior agents.

One thing more it is neceffary to premife. The merits of each of the three heads I have enumerated are to be confidered negatively. The corporate duties of mankind are the refult of their irregularities and follies in their individual capacity. If they had no imperfection, or if men were fo conftituted as to be fufficiently and fufficiently early corrected by perfuation alone, fociety would ceafe from its functions. Of confequence, of the three forms of government and their compositions that is the beft, which thall leaft impede the activity and application of our intellectual powers. It was in the recollection of this truth that I have preferred the term political inftitution to that of government, the former appearing to be fufficiently expressive of that relative form, whatever it be, into which individuals would fall, when there was no need of force to direct them into their proper channel, and were no refractory members to correct.

T 383 T

CHAP. II.

OF EDUCATION, THE EDUCATION OF A PRINCE.

NATURE OF MONARCHY DELINEATED. --- SCHOOL OF AD-VERSITY .- TENDENCY OF SUPERFLUITY TO INSPIRE EF-RIENCE-ILLUSTRATED IN THE CASE OF PRINCES .---MANNER IN WHICH THEY ARE ADDRESSED.---INEFFICACY OF THE INSTRUCTION BESTOWED UPON THEM.

FIRST then of monarchy; and we will first suppose the BOOK v. CHAP.II. fucceffion to the monarchy to be hereditary. In this cafe we have the additional advantage of confidering this diffinguilhed mortal, who is thus fet over the heads of the reft of his fpecies, from the period of his birth.

The abstract idea of a king is of an extremely momentous Nature of and extraordinary nature; and, though the idea has by the accident of education been rendered familiar to us from our infancy, yet perhaps the majority of readers can recollect the period, when it ftruck them with aftonifhment and confounded their powers of apprehenfion. It being fufficiently evident that fome fpecies of government was neceffary, and that individuals muft...

monarchy delincated.

OF EDUCATION,

BOOK V. CHAP. II.

must concede a part of that facred and important privilege by which each man is conftituted judge of his own words and actions, for the fake of general good, it was next requifite to confider what expedients might be fubftituted in the room of this original claim. One of these expedients has been monarchy. It was the intereft of each individual that his individuality fhould be invaded as rarely as poffible; that no invafion fhould be permitted to flow from wanton caprice, from finister and difingenuous views, or from the infligation of anger, partiality and paffion ; and that this bank, feverely levied upon the peculium of each member of the fociety, fhould be administered with frugality and difcretion. It was therefore without doubt a very bold adventure to commit this precious depofit to the cuftody of a fingle man. If we contemplate the human powers whether of body or mind, we shall find them much better fuited to the fuperintendence of our private concerns and to the administering occafional affiftance to others, than to the accepting the formal truit of fuperintending the affairs and watching for the happiness of millions. If we recollect the phyfical and moral equality of mankind, it will appear a very violent ufurpation upon this principle to place one individual at fo vaft an interval from the reft of his fpecies. - Let us then confider how fuch perfons are ufually educated, or may be expected to be educated, and how well they are prepared for this illustrious office.

School of adverfity. It is a common opinion that adverfity is the fchool in which all extraordinary extraordinary virtue must be formed. Henry the fourth of BOOK V. France and Elizabeth of England experienced a long feries of calamities before they were elevated to a throne. Alfred, of whom the obfcure chronicles of a barbarous age record fuch fuperior virtues, paffed through the viciflitudes of a vagabond and a fugitive. Even the mixed, and upon the whole the vicious, vet accomplished, characters of Frederic and Alexander, were not formed without the interference of injuffice and perfecution.

EDUCATION OF A PRINCE. THE

This hypothefis however feems to have been pushed too far. It is no more reafonable to fuppofe that virtue cannot be matured without injuffice, than to believe, which has been another prevailing opinion, that human happiness cannot be fecured without imposture and deceit. Both these errors have a common fource, a distrust of the omnipotence of truth. If their advocates had reflected more deeply upon the nature of the human mind, they would have perceived that all our voluntary actions are judgments of the understanding, and that actions of the most judicious and useful nature must infallibly flow from a real and genuine conviction of truth.

But, though the exaggerated opinion here flated of the ufeful- Tendency of nels of adversity be erroneous, it is, like many other of our to infpire eferrors, allied to important truth. If adverfity be not neceffary, it must be allowed that prosperity is pernicious. Not a genuine and philosophical prosperity, which requires no more than found fuperfluity feminacy :

health

CHAP. II.

OF EDUCATION,

BOOK V. CHAP. II. health with a found intellect, the capacity of procuring for ourfelves by a moderate and well regulated industry the means of fubfistence, virtue and wildom : but prosperity as it is usually underftood, that is, a competence, provided for us by the caprice of human inflitution, inviting our bodies to indolence, and our minds to lethargy; and ftill more prosperity, as it is underftood in the cafe of noblemen and princes, that is, a fuperfluity of wealth, which deprives us of all intercourfe with our fellow men upon equal terms, and makes us prifoners of state, gratified indeed with baubles and fplendour, but fhut out from the real benefits of fociety and the perception of truth. If truth be fo intrinfically powerful as to make adverfity unneceffary to excite our attention to it, it is neverthelefs certain that luxury and wealth have the most fatal effects in distorting it. If it require no foreign aid to affift its energies, we ought however to be upon our guard against principles and fituations the tendency of which may be perpetually to counteract it.

Nor is this all. One of the moft effential ingredients of virtue is fortitude. It was the plan of many of the Grecian philofophers, and moft of all of Diogenes, to fhow to mankind how very limited was the fupply that our neceffities required, and how little dependent our real welfare and profperity were upon the caprice of others. Among innumerable incidents upon record that illuftrate this principle, a fingle one may fuffice to fuggeft to our minds its general fpirit. Diogenes had a flave whofe whole name was Menas, and Menas thought proper upon fome occafion to elope. "Ha !" faid the philosopher, "can Menas live without Diogenes, and cannot Diogenes live without Menas?" There can be no leffon more important than that which is thus conveyed. The man that does not know himfelf not to be at the mercy of other men, that does not feel that he is invulnerable to all the viciffitudes of fortune, is incapable of a conftant and inflexible virtue. He, to whom the reft of his fpecies can reafonably look up with confidence, must be firm, becaufe his mind is filled with the excellence of the object he purfues; and chearful, becaufe he knows that it is out of the power of events to injure him. If any one should choose to imagine that this idea of virtue is ftrained too high, yet all must allow that no man can be entitled to our confidence, who trembles at every wind, who can endure no adverfity, and whofe very existence is linked to the artificial character he fustains. Nothing can more reafonably excite our contempt, than a man who, if he were once reduced to the genuine and fimple condition of man, would be reduced to defpair, and find himfelf incapable of confulting and providing for his own fubfiftence. Fortitude is a habit of mind that grows out of a fenfe of our own independence. If there be a man, who dares not even truft his own imagination with the fancied change of his circumftances, he must necessarily be effeminate, irrefolute and temporifing. He that loves fenfuality or oftentation better than virtue, may be entitled to our pity, but a madman only would entruft to his difpofal any thing that was dear to him.

386

THE EDUCATION OF A PRINCE.

387

BOOK V. CHAP. II.

Again,

BOOK V. CHAP. II.

to deprive us of the benefit of experience :

Again, the only means by which truth, however immutable in its own nature, can be communicated to the human mind is through the inlet of the fenfes. It is perhaps impoffible that a man shut up in a cabinet can ever be wife. If we would acquire knowledge, we must open our eyes, and contemplate the univerfe. Till we are acquainted with the meaning of terms and the nature of the objects around us, we cannot understand the propositions that may be formed concerning them. Till we are acquainted with the nature of the objects around us, we cannot compare them with the principles we have formed, and understand the modes of employing them. There are other ways of attaining wifdom and ability befide the fchool of adverfity, but there is no way of attaining them but through the medium of experience. That is, experience brings in the materials with which intellect works; for it must be granted that a man of limited experience will often be more capable than he who has gone through the greatest variety of scenes; or rather perhaps, that one man may collect more experience in a fphere of a few miles fquare, than another who has failed round the world.

To conceive truly the value of experience we must recollect the infinite improvements the human mind has received in a long feries of ages, and how an enlightened European differs from a folitary favage. However multifarious are these improvements, there are but two ways in which they can be appropriated by any individual; either at second hand by books and 7 conversation, converfation, or at first hand by our own observations of men and things. The improvement we receive in the first of these modes is unlimited; but it will not do alone. We cannot understand books, till we have seen the subjects of which they treat.

THE EDUCATION OF A PRINCE.

He that knows the mind of man, must have observed it for himfelf; he that knows it most intimately, must have observed it in its greatest variety of fituations. He must have feen it without difguife, when no exterior fituation puts a curb upon its paffions, and induces the individual to exhibit a fludied, not a fpontaneous character. He must have feen men in their unguarded moments, when the eagerness of temporary refentment tips their tongue with fire, when they are animated and dilated by hope, when they are tortured and anatomifed by defpair, when the foul pours out its inmost felf into the bofom of an equal and a friend. Laftly, he must himfelf have been an actor in the fcene, have had his own paffions brought into play, have known the anxiety of expectation and the transport of fuccefs, or he will feel and understand about as much of what he fees, as mankind in general would of the transactions of the vitriolifed inhabitants of the planet Mercury, or the falamanders that live in the fun.-Such is the education of the true philofopher, the genuine politician, the friend and benefactor of human kind.

What is the education of a prince? Its first quality is extreme illustrated in the case of tendernefs.

BOOK V.

EDUCATION. OF.

BOOK V. tendernefs. The winds of heaven are not permitted to blow CHAP. II. upon him. He is dreffed and undreffed by his lacqueys and va-His wants are carefully anticipated; his defires without lets. any effort of his profufely fupplied. His health is of too much importance to the community to permit him to exert any considerable effort either of body or mind. He must not hear the voice of reprimand or blame. In all things it is first of all to be remembered that he is a prince, that is, fome rare and precious creature, but not of human kind.

Manner in which they

As he is the heir to a throne, it is never forgotten by those are addreffed. about him, that confiderable importance is to be annexed to his favour or his difpleafure. Accordingly they never express themfelves in his prefence frankly and naturally, either refpecting him or themfelves. They are fupporting a part. They play under Their own fortune and emolument is always uppera mafk. most in their minds, at the fame time that they are anxious to appear generous, difinterefted and fincere. All his caprices are to be complied with. All his gratifications are to be fludied. They find him a depraved and fordid mortal; they judge of his appetites and capacities by their own; and the gratifications they recommend ferve to fink him deeper in folly and vice.

> What is the refult of fuch an education? Having never experienced contradiction, the young prince is arrogant and prefump-Having always been accuftomed to the flaves of neceftuous. fity fity or the flaves of choice, he does not underftand even the BOOK V. meaning of the word freedom. His temper is infolent, and impatient of parley and expoftulation. Knowing nothing, he believes himfelf fovereignly informed, and runs headlong into danger, not from firmnefs and courage, but from the moft egregious wilfulnefs and vanity. Like Pyrrho among the ancient philofophers, if his attendants were at a diftance, and he trufted himfelf alone in the open air, he would perhaps be run over by the next coach, or fall down the firft precipice. His violence and prefumption are flrikingly contrafted with the extreme timidity of his difpofition. The firft oppofition terrifies him, the firft difficulty feen and underftood appears infuperable. He trembles at a fhadow, and at the very femblance of adverfity is diffolved into tears. It has accordingly been obferved that princes are commonly fuperflitious beyond the rate of common mortals.

THE EDUCATION OF A PRINCE.

Above all, fimple, unqualified truth is a ftranger to his ear. It either never approaches; or if fo unexpected a gueft fhould once appear, it meets with fo cold a reception, as to afford little encouragement to a fecond vifit. The longer he has been accuftomed to falfhood and flattery, the more grating will it found. The longer he has been accuftomed to falfhood and flattery, the more terrible will the tafk appear to him, to change his taftes, and difcard his favourites. He will either place a blind confidence in all men, or, having detected the infincerity of thofe who were moft agreeable to him, will conclude that all men are

5

391 CHAP. II.

knavifh

OF EDUCATION,

BOOK V. CHAP. II. knavish and defigning. As a confequence of this last opinion, he will become indifferent to mankind, callous to their sufferings, and will believe that even the virtuous are knaves under a crastier mask. Such is the education of an individual, who is defined to superintend the affairs and watch for the happiness of millions.

In this picture are indeed contained all those features which naturally conftitute the education of a prince, into the conducting of which no perfon of energy and virtue has by acciden been introduced. In real life it will be varioufly modified, but the majority of the features, unless in very rare inftances, will remain the fame. In no case can the education of a friend and benefactor of human kind, as sketched in a preceding page, by any speculative contrivance be communicated.

Inefficacy of the inftruction beftowed upon them.

Nor is there any difficulty in accounting for this univerfal mifcarriage. The wifeft preceptor thus circumftanced muft labour under infuperable difadvantages. No fituation can be fo unnatural as that of a prince, fo difficult to be underflood by him who occupies it, fo irrefiftibly propelling the mind to miftake. The firft ideas it fuggefts are of a tranquillifing and foporific nature. It fills him with the opinion of his fecretly poffeffing fome inherent advantage over the reft of his fpecies, by which he is formed to command and they to obey. If you affure him of the contrary, you can expect only an imperfect and temporary credit; for facts, which in this cafe depofe againft you, fpeak a language language more emphatic and intelligible than words. If it were not as he fuppofes, why fhould every one that approaches be eager to ferve him? The fordid and felfifh motives by which they are really animated he is very late in detecting. It may even be doubted whether the individual, who was never led to but the professions of others to the teft by his real wants, has in any inftance been completely aware of the little credit that is often due to them. A prince finds himfelf courted and adored long before he can have acquired a merit entitling him to fuch diffinctions. By what arguments can you perfuade him laborioufly to purfue what appears fo completely fuperfluous? How can you induce him to be diffatisfied with his prefent acquifitions, while every other perfon affures him that his accomplifhments are admirable and his mind a mirror of fagacity? How will you perfuade him who finds all his wifhes anticipated, to engage in any arduous undertaking, or propose any distant object for his ambition?

THE EDUCATION OF A PRINCE.

But, even fhould you fucceed in this, his purfuits may be expected to be either mifchievons or ufelefs. His underftanding is difforted; and the bafis of all morality, the recollection that other men are beings of the fame order with himfelf, is extirpated. It would be unreafonable to expect from him any thing generous and humane. Unfortunate as he is, his fituation is continually propelling him to vice, and deftroying the germs of integrity and virtue before they are unfolded. If fenfibility begin

3 E

BOOK V. CHAP. II.

OF EDUCATION,

BOOK V. CHAP. II. gin to difcover itfelf, it is immediately poifoned by the blighting winds of flattery. Amufement and feufuality call with an imperious voice, and will not allow him time to feel. Artificial as is the character he fills, even fhould he afpire to fame, it will be by the artificial methods of falfe refinement, or the barbarous inventions of ufurpation and conqueft, not by the plain and unornamented road of benevolence.

Some idea of the methods ufually purfued, and the effects produced in the education of a prince, may be collected from a late publication of the celebrated madame de Genlis, in which fhe gives an account of her own proceedings in relation to the children of the duke d'Orleans. She thus describes the features of their difpolition and habits at the time they were committed to her care. " The duke de Valois (the eldeft) is frequently coarfe in his manners and ignoble in his expreffions. He finds a great deal of humour in defcribing mean and common objects by vulgar expreffions; and all this feafoned with the proverbial fertility of Sancho Panza himfelf, and fet off with a loud forced laugh. His prate is eternal, nor does he fufpect but that it must be an exquifite gratification to any one to be entertained with it; and he frequently heightens the jeft by a falfhood uttered in the gravest manner imaginable. Neither he nor his brother has the leaft regard for any body but himfelf; they are felfifh and grafping to an extreme, confidering every thing that is done for them as their due, and imagining that they are in no refpect obliged to confult the happiness of others. The flightest reproof is be- BOOK V. CHAP, IL yond meafure flocking to them, and the indignation they conceive at it immediately vents itfelf in fullennefs or tears. They are in an uncommon degree effeminate, afraid of the wind or the cold, unable to run or to leap, or even fo much as to walk at a round pace, or for more than half an hour together. The duke de Valois has an extreme terror of dogs, to fuch a degree as to turn pale and fhriek out at the fight of one." "When the children of the duke d'Orleans were committed to my care, they had been accuftomed in winter to wear under-waiftcoats, two pair of ftockings, gloves, muffs, &c. The eldeft, who was eight years of age, never came down ftairs without being fupported by the arm of one or two perfons; the domeftics were obliged to render them the meaneft fervices, and, for a cold or any flight indifpolition, fat up with them for nights together*."

to

THE EDUCATION OF A PRINCE.

Madame

* " M. de Valois a encore des manières bien défagréables, des expressions ignobles, & de tems en tems le plus mauvais ton. A présent qu'il est à fon aise avec moi, il me débite avec confiance toutes les gentilless qu'on lui a apprises. Tout cela affaisonné de tous les proverbes de Sancho, et d'un gros rire forcé, qui n'est pas le moindre de ses désagrémens. En outre, il est très bavard, grand conteur, & il ment souvent pour se divertir ; avec cela la plus grande indifférence pour M. & Mde. de Chartres, n'y pensant jamais, les voyant froidement, ne désirant point les voir.—Ils étoient l'un & l'autre de la plus grande impolitesse, oui & non tout court, ou un signe de tête, peu reconnoissant, parce qu'ils eroient qu'il n'est point de foins, d'attentions, ni d'égards qu'on ne les doive. Il n'étoit pas possible de les reprendre fans les mettre au désepoir; duns ce cas, toujours des pleurs ou de l'humeur. Ils étoient très douillets, craignant le went, le froid, ne 3 E 2

OF EDUCATION.

BOOK V. CHAP. II.

396

Madame de Genlis, a woman of uncommon talents and comprehenfive views, though herfelf infected with a confiderable number of errors, corrected thefe defects in the young princes. But few princes have the good fortune to be educated by a mind fo powerful and wife as that of madame de Genlis, and we may fafely take our flandard for the average calculation rather from her predeceffors than herfelf. She forms the exception; they the rule. Even were it otherwife, we have already feen what it is that a preceptor can do in the education of a prince. Nor fhould it be forgotten that thefe were not of the clafs of princes defined to a throne.

pouvant, non feulement ni courir ni fauter, mais même ni marcher d'un bon pas, & plus d'une demi-heure. Et M. le duc de Valois ayant une peur affreuse des chiens au point de pâlir & de crier quand il en voyoit un."

"Quand on m'a remis ceux que j'ai élevés, ils avoient l'habitude de porter en hiver des gillets, des doubles paires de bas, des grands manchons, &c. L'ainé, qui avoit huit ans, ne défeendoit jamais un efcalier fans s'appuyer fur le bras d'une ou deux perfonnes. On obligeoit des domeftiques de ces enfans à leur rendre les fervices les plus vils : pour un rhume, pour une légère incommodité, ces domeftiques passiont fans cesse les nuits, &c."

> Leçons d'une Gouvernante à fes Eleves, par Mde. de Sillery Brulart (ci-devant conteffe de Genlis), Tome IL.

> > CHAP,

[ 397 ]

CHAP. III.

PRIVATE LIFE OF A PRINCE.

PRINCIPLES BY WHICH HE IS INFLUENCED-IRRESPONSI-BILITY-IMPATIENCE OF CONTROL-HABITS OF DIS-SIPATION-IGNORANCE-DISLIKE OF TRUTH-DISLIKE OF JUSTICE-PITIABLE SITUATION OF PRINCES.

CUCH is the culture; the fruit that it produces may eafily be BOOK V. conjectured. The fashion which is given to the mind in youth, it ordinarily retains in age; and it is with ordinary cafes only that the prefent argument is concerned. If there have been kings, as there have been other men, in the forming of whom particular have outweighed general caufes, the recollection of fuch exceptions has little to do with the queftion, whether monarchy be generally fpeaking a benefit or an evil. Nature has no particular mould of which the forms the intellects of princes: monarchy is certainly not jure divino; and of confequence, what- ever fystem we may adopt upon the subject of natural talents. the ordinary rate of kings will poffels at best but the ordinary rate of human understanding. In what has been faid, and in a what remains to fay, we are not to fix our minds upon pro--digies, but to think of the fpecies as it is ufually found.

But,

BOOK V. CHAP. III. But, though education for the most part determines the character of the future man, it may not be useless to follow the difquisition a little farther. Education in one fense is the affair of youth, but in a stricter and more accurate fense the education of an intellectual being can terminate only with his life. Every incident that befals us is the parent of a fentiment, and either confirms or counteracts the preconceptions of the mind.

Principles by which he is influenced:

irrefponfibility :

Now the caufes that acted upon kings in their minority, continue to act upon them in their maturer years. Every thing is carefully kept out of fight that may remind them they are men. Every means is employed that can perfuade them that they are of a different fpecies of beings, and fubject to different laws of "A king," fuch at leaft is the maxim of abfolute exiftence. monarchies, " though obliged by a rigid fyftem of duties, is accountable for his discharge of those duties only to God." That is, exposed to a hundred fold more feductions than ordinary men. he has not like them the checks of a visible constitution of things, perpetually through the medium of the fenfes making their way to the mind. He is taught to believe himfelf fuperior to the reftraints that bind ordinary men, and fubject to a rule peculiarly his own. Every thing is trufted to the motives of an invisible world; which, whatever may be the effimate to which they are entitled in the view of philosophy, mankind are not now to learn are weakly felt by those who are immerged in fplendour or affairs, and have little chance of fuccefs in contending with the imprefiions of fenfe and the allurements of vifible BOOK V. CHAP. III. objects.

ing

4

It is a maxim generally received in the world "that every king impatience is a defpot in his heart," and the maxim can feldom fail to be verified in the experiment. A limited monarch and an abfolute monarch, though in many refpects different, approach in more points than they feparate. A monarch, ftrictly without limitation, is perhaps a phenomenon that never yet exifted. All countries have poffeffed fome check upon defpotifm, which to their deluded imaginations appeared a fufficient fecurity, for their independence. All kings have poffeffed fuch a portion of luxury and eafe, have been fo far furrounded with fervility and falfhood, and to fuch a degree exempt from perfonal refponfibility, as to deftroy the natural and wholefome complexion of the human mind. Being placed fo high, they find but one ftep between them and the fummit of focial authority, and they cannot but eagerly defire to gain that flep. Having fo frequent occafions of feeing their behefts implicitly obeyed, being trained in fo long a fcene of adulation and fervility, it is impoffible they fhould not feel fome indignation at the honeft firmnefs that fets limits to their omnipotence. But to fay, " that every king is a defpot in his heart," will prefently be flown to be the fame thing as to fay, that every king is by unavoidable neceffity the enemy of the human race.

of control:

The

BOOK V. CHAP. III. habits of diffipation :

The principal fource of virtuous conduct is to recollect the absent. He that takes into his estimate present things alone. will be the perpetual flave of fenfuality and felfishness. He will have no principle by which to reftrain appetite, or to employ himfelf in just and benevolent pursuits. The cause of virtue and innocence, however urgent, will no fooner ceafe to be heard, than it will be forgotten. Accordingly nothing is found more -favourable to the attainment of moral excellence than meditation: nothing more inimical than an uninterrupted fucceffion of amufements. It would be abfurd to expect from kings the recollection of virtue in exile or difgrace. It has generally been observed, that even for the loss of a flatterer or a favourite they fpeedily confole themfelves. Image after image fo fpeedily fueceed in their fenforium, that no one of them leaves a durable impreffion. A circumstance which contributes to this moral infenfibility, is the effeminacy and cowardice which grow out of perpetual indulgence. Their minds fpontaneoufly fhrink from painful ideas, from motives that would awaken them to effort, and reflections that would demand feverity of difquifition.

ignorance:

What fituation can be more unfortunate than that of a firanger, who cannot fpeak our language, knows nothing of our manners and cuftoms, and enters into the bufy fcene of our affairs, without one friend to advife with or affift him? If any thing is to be got by fuch a man, we may depend upon feeing him inftantly furrounded with a group of thieves, fharpers and extortioners.

2

They will make him fwallow the most incredible extortioners. ftories, will impose upon him in every article of his neceffities or his commerce, and he will leave the country at laft, as unfriended and in as abfolute ignorance as he entered it. Such a ftranger is a king; but with this difference, that the foreigner, if he be a man of fagacity and penetration, may make his way through this crowd of intruders, and difcover a fet of perfons worthy of his confidence, which can fcarcely in any cafe happen to a king. He is placed in a vortex peculiarly his own. He is furrounded with an atmosphere through which it is impossible for him to difcover the true colours and figure of things. The perfons that are near him are in a cabal and confpiracy of their own, and there is nothing about which they are more anxious than to keep truth from approaching him. The man, who is not acceffible to every comer, who delivers up his perfon into the cuftody of another, and may, for any thing that he can tell, be precluded from that very intercourfe and knowledge it is moft important for him to poffefs, whatever name he may bear, is in realityªa prifoner.

Whatever the arbitrary inflitutions of men may pretend, the more powerful inflitutions of nature forbid one man to tranfact the affairs and provide for the welfare of millions. A king foon finds the neceffity of entrufting his functions to the administration of his fervants. He acquires the habit of feeing with their eyes and acting with their hands. He finds the neceffity of confid-

3 F

BOOK V. CHAP. III.

ing

BOOK V. CHAP. III. ing implicitly in their fidelity. Like a man long flut up in a dungeon, his organs are not ftrong enough to bear the irradiation of truth. Accuftomed to receive information of the feelings and fentiments of mankind through the medium of another perfon, he cannot bear directly to converse with business and affairs. Whoever would detach his confidence from his prefent favourites, and induce him to pafs over again in fcrutiny the principles and data upon which he has already determined, requires of him too painful a tafk. He haftens from his informer to communicate the accufation to his favourite, and the tongue that has been accuftomed to gain credit, eafily varnishes over this new disco-He flies from uncertainty, anxiety and doubt to his rouverv. tine of amufements; or amufement prefents itfelf, is importunate to be received, and prefently obliterates the tale that overfpread the mind with melancholy and fufpicion. Much has been faid of intrigue and duplicity. They have been alledged to intrude themfelves into the walks of commerce, to haunt the intercourse of men of letters, and to rend the petty concerns of a village with faction. But, wherever elfe they may be ftrangers, in courts they undoubtedly find a congenial climate. The intrufive talebearer, who carries knowledge to the ear of kings, is within that circle an object of general abhorrence. The favourite marks him for his victim; and the inactive and unimpaffioned temper of the monarch foon refigns him to the vindictive importunity of his adverfary. It is in the contemplation of these circumstances that Fenelon has remarked that " kings 8

402

" kings are the most unfortunate and the most misled of all hu-BOOK V. man beings*."

But in reality were they in possession of purer fources of in- Dislike of formation, it would be to little purpofe. Royalty inevitably allies itfelf to vice. Virtue, in proportion as it has taken poffeffion of any character, is just, confistent and fincere. But kings, debauched by their education, ruined by their fituation, cannot endure an intercourfe with thefe attributes. Sincerity, that would tell them of their errors and remind them of their cowardice; juffice, that, uninfluenced by the trappings of majefty, would effimate the man at his true defert; confiftency, that no temptation would induce to part with its principles; are odious and intolerable in their eyes. From fuch intruders they haften to men of a pliant character, who will flatter their miftakes, put a falfe varnish on their actions, and be visited by no impertinent fcruples in affifting the indulgence of their appetites. There is fcarcely in human nature an inflexibility that can refift perpetual flattery and compliance. The virtues that grow up among us are cultured in the open foil of equality, not in the artificial climate of greatness. We need the winds to harden, as much as * " Les plus malheureux & les plus aveugles de tous les hommes." Télémaque, Liv. XIII. More forcible and impreflive defcription is fcarcely any where to be found, than that of the evils infeparable from monarchical government, contained in this and the following book of Fenelon's work.

> 2 F 2 the 403

CHAP. III.

truth :

BOOK V. CHAP. III.

the heat to cherifh us. Many a mind, that promifed well in its outfet, has been found incapable to ftand the teft of perpetual indulgence and eafe, without one fhock to waken, and one calamity to ftop it in its fmooth career.

diflike of juffice.

Monarchy is in reality fo unnatural an inftitution, that mankind have at all times ftrongly fufpected it was unfriendly to their happines. The power of truth upon important topics. is fuch, that it may rather be faid to be obfcured than obliterated; and fallhood has fcarcely ever been fo fuccefsful, as not tohave had a reftlefs and powerful antagonist in the heart of its votaries. The man who with difficulty earns his fcanty fubfuftence, cannot behold the oftentatious fplendour of a king, without being vifited by fome fenfe of injuffice. He inevitably queftions in his mind the utility of an officer whofe fervices are hired at fo enormous a price. If he confider the fubject with, any degree of accuracy, he is led to perceive, and that with fufficient furprife, that a king is nothing more than a common mortal, exceeded by many and equalled by more in every requifite of ftrength, capacity and virtue. He feels therefore that nothing can be more groundlefs and unjuft than the fuppofing that one fuch man as this is the fitteft and most competent inftrument for regulating the affairs of nations.

These reflections are fo unavoidable that kings themselves. have often been aware of the danger to their imaginary happi-

nels

404

nefs with which they are pregnant. They have fometimes been BOOK V. alarmed with the progrefs of thinking, and oftener regarded the eafe and prosperity of their subjects as a source of terror and apprehension. They justly confider their functions as a fort of public exhibition, the fuccefs of which depends upon the credulity of the fpectators, and which good fenfe and courage would fpeedily bring to a termination. Hence the well known maxims of monarchical government, that eafe is the parent of rebellion. and that it is neceffary to keep the people in a flate of poverty and endurance in order to render them fubmiffive. Hence it has been the perpetual complaint of defpotifm, that "the reflive knaves are overrun with eafe, and plenty ever is the nurfe of faction *." Hence it has been the leffon perpetually read to monarchs: "Render your fubjects profperous, and they will fpeedily refufe to labour; they will become flubborn, proud, unfubmiffive to the yoke, and ripe for revolt. It is impotence and mifery that alone will render them fupple, and prevent them from rebelling against the dictates of authority +."

It is a common and vulgar observation that the ftate of a king Pitiable fituation of is greatly to be pitied. "All his actions are hemmed in with princes.

* Tragedy of Jane Shore, Act III.

. + " Si vous mettez les peuples dans l'abondance, ils ne travailleront plus, ils deviendront fiers, indociles, et seront toujours prêts à se revolter : il n'y a que la foiblesse et la misere qui les rendent souples, ct qui les empêchent de resister à l'autorité."

Télémaque, Liv. XIII. anxiety CHAP. III.

BOOK V. CHAP. III.

406

anxiety and doubt. He cannot, like other men, indulge the gay and carelefs hilarity of his mind; but is obliged, if he be of an honeft and confcientious difpolition, to confider how neceflary the time, which he is thoughtlefsly giving to amufement, may be to the relief of a worthy and opprefied individual; how many benefits might in a thoufand inflances refult from his interference; how many a guilelefs and undefigning heart might be cheared by his juffice. The conduct of kings is the fubject of the fevereft criticifm, which the very nature of their fituation difables them to encounter. A thoufand things are done in their name in which they have no participation; a thoufand ftories are fo difguifed to their ear as to render the truth abfolutely undifcoverable; and the king is the general fcape-goat, loaded with the offences of all his dependents."

No picture can be more juft, judicious and humane than that which is thus exhibited. Why then fhould the advocates of antimonarchical principles be confidered as the enemies of kings? They would relieve them from "a load would fink a navy, too much honour *." They would exalt them to the happy and enviable condition of private individuals. In reality nothing can be more iniquitous and cruel than to impofe upon a man the unnatural office of a king. It is not lefs inequitable towards him that exercifes it, than towards them who are fubjected to it.

* Shakespeare : Henry the Eighth, Act III.

Kings,

Kings, if they underftood their own interefts, would be the first to espouse these principles, the most eager to listen to them, the most fervent in expressing their esteem of the men who undertake to impress upon their species this important truth.

e

BOOK V. CHAP. III.

407

[ 408 ]

CHAP. IV.

OF A VIRTUOUS DESPOTISM.

SUPPOSED EXCELLENCE OF THIS FORM OF GOVERNMENT CONTROVERTED—FROM THE NARROWNESS OF HUMAN POWERS.—CASE OF A VICIOUS ADMINISTRATION—OF A VIRTUOUS ADMINISTRATION INTENDED TO BE FORMED. — MONARCHY NOT ADAPTED TO THE GOVERNMENT OF LARGE STATES.

BOOK V.

Suppofed excellence of this form of government controverted: THERE is a principle frequently maintained upon this fubject, which is well entitled to our impartial confideration. It is granted by those who espouse it, "that absolute monarchy, from the imperfection of those by whom it is administered, is most frequently attended with evil;" but they affert, "that it is the best and most defirable of all forms under a good and virtuous prince. It is exposed," fay they, "to the fate of all excellent natures, and from the best thing frequently, if corrupted, becomes the worst." This remark is certainly not very decisive of the general question, fo long as any weight shall be attributed to the arguments which have been adduced to evince what fort of character and disposition may be ordinarily expected in princes. It may however be allowed, if true, to create in the mind a fort of partial retrospect to this happy and perfect , despotism; despotisin; and, if it can be shown to be false, it will render the argument for the abolition of monarchy, fo far as it is concerned, more entire and complete.

Now, whatever difpositions any man may posses in favour from the of the welfare of others, two things are neceffary to give them validity; difcernment and power. I can promote the welfare of a few perfons, becaufe I can be fufficiently informed of their circumstances. I can promote the welfare of many in certain general articles, becaufe for this purpofe it is only neceffary that I should be informed of the nature of the human mind as fuch. not of the perfonal fituation of the individuals concerned. But for one man to undertake to administer the affairs of millions, to fupply, not general principles and perfpicuous reafoning, but particular application, and measures adapted to the neceffities of the moment, is of all undertakings the moft extravagant and abfurd.

The most natural and obvious of all proceedings is for each man to be the fovereign arbiter of his own concerns. If the imperfection, the narrow views and the miftakes of human beings render this in certain cafes inexpedient and impracticable, the next refource is to call in the opinion of his peers, perfons who from their vicinity may be prefumed to have fome general knowledge of the cafe, and who have leifure and means minutely to inveftigate the merits of the queftion. It cannot reafonably

3 G

409

BOOK V. CHAP. IV.

narrownefs of human powers.

be

í

BOOK V. CHAP. IV. be doubted, that the fame expedient which men employed in their civil and criminal concerns, would by uninftructed mortals be adopted in the affeffment of taxes, in the deliberations of commerce, and in every other article in which their common interefts were involved, only generalifing the deliberative affembly or pannel in proportion to the generality of the queftion to be decided.

Monarchy, inftead of referring every queftion to the perfons concerned or their neighbours, refers it to a fingle individual placed at the greateft diftance poffible from the ordinary members of the fociety. Inftead of diftributing the caufes to be judged into as many parcels as they would conveniently admit for the fake of providing leifure and opportunities of examination, it draws them to a fingle centre, and renders enquiry and examination impoffible. A defpot, however virtuoufly difpofed, is obliged to act in the dark, to derive his knowledge from other men's information, and to execute his behefts by other men's inftrumentality. Monarchy feems to be a fpecies of government proficibed by the nature of man; and thofe perfons, who furnifhed their defpot with integrity and virtue, forgot to add omnifcience and omnipotence, qualities not lefs neceffary to fit him for the office they had provided.

Cafe of a Let us fuppofe this honeft and incorruptible defpot to be ferved miniftration: by minifters, avaricious, hypocritical and interefted. What will the people gain by the good intentions of their monarch? He BOOK V. will mean them the greatest benefits, but he will be altogether unacquainted with their fituation, their character and their wants. The information he receives will frequently be found the very reverse of the truth. He will be taught that one individual is highly meritorious and a proper fubject of reward. whofe only merit is the profligate cruelty with which he has ferved the purposes of his administration. He will be taught that another is the peft of the community, who is indebted for this report to the fleady virtue with which he has traverfed and defeated the wickedness of government. He will mean the greateft benefits to his people; but when he prefcribes fomething calculated for their advantage, his fervants under pretence of complying fhall in reality perpetrate diametrically the reverfe. Nothing will be more dangerous than to endeavour to remove the obscurity with which his ministers furround him. The man, who attempts fo hardy a tafk, will become the inceffant object of their hatred. Though the fovereign fhould be ever fo feverely just, the time will come when his observation will be laid afleep, while malice and revenge are ever vigilant. Could he unfold the fecrets of his prifon houfes of flate, he would find men committed in his name whofe crimes he never knew, whofe names he never heard of, perhaps men whom he honoured Such is the hiftory of the benevolent and and effeemed. philanthropic defpots whom memory has recorded; and the conclusion from the whole is, that, wherever defpotifm exists, there

the

410

3 G 2

411

CHAP. IV.

ì

BOOK V. CHAP. IV.

412

there it will always be attended with the evils of defpotifim, capricious meafures and arbitrary infliction.

of a virtuous administration intended to be formed.

" But will not a wife king take care to provide himfelf with good and virtuous fervants ?" Undoubtedly he will effect a part of this, but he cannot fuperfede the effential natures of things. He that executes any office as a deputy will never difcharge it in the fame perfection as if he were the principal. Either the minister must be the author of the plans which he carries into effect, and then it is of little confequence, except fo far as relates to his integrity in the choice of his fervants, what fort of mortal the fovereign shall be found; or he must play a fubordinate part, and then it is impossible to transfuse into his mind the perfpicacity and energy of his mafter. Wherever defpotifm exifts, it cannot remain in a fingle hand, but must be transmitted whole and entire through all the progreffive links of authority. To render defpotifm aufpicious and benign it is neceffary, not only that the fovereign fhould poffefs every human excellence, but that all his officers should be men of penetrating genius and unfpotted virtue. If they fall fhort of this, they will, like the minifters of Elizabeth, be fometimes fpecious profligates *, and fometimes men, who, however admirably adapted for bufinefs. confult on many occasions exclusively their private advantage. worfhip the rifing fun, enter into vindictive cabals, and cuff

* Dudley earl of Leicefter.

down

down new fledged merit *. Wherever the continuity is broken, BOOKV. CHAP. IV. the flood of vice will bear down all before it. One weak or difingenuous man will be the fource of unbounded mifchief. It is the nature of monarchy under all its forms to confide greatly in the diferetion of individuals. It provides no refource for maintaining and diffusing the spirit of justice. Every thing refts, upon the permanence and extent of influence of perfonal virtue.

Another polition, not lefs generally afferted than that of the Monarchy defirablenefs of a virtuous defpotifin, is, "that republicanifm is to the goa fpecies of government practicable only in a fmall ftate, while large flates. monarchy is beft fitted to embrace the concerns of a vaft and flourishing empire." The reverse of this, fo far at least as relates to monarchy, appears at first fight to be the truth. The competence of any government cannot be meafured by a purer ftandard, than the extent and accuracy of its information. In this refpect monarchy appears in all cafes to be wretchedly deficient; but, if it can ever be admitted, it must furely be in those narrow and limited inftances where an individual can with leaft abfurdity be fuppofed to be acquainted with the affairs and interefts of the whole.

* Cecil earl of Salifbury, lord treafurer ; Howard earl of Nottingham, lord admiral, &c.

not adapted vernment of 413

CHAP.

[ 414 ]

CHAP. V.

OF COURTS AND MINISTERS.

SYSTEMATICAL MONOPOLY OF CONFIDENCE.—CHARACTER OF MINISTERS—OF THEIR DEPENDENTS.—VENALITY OF COURTS.—UNIVERSALITY OF THIS PRINCIPLE.

BOOK V. CHAP.V. W E fhall be better enabled to judge of the difpolitions with which information is communicated and measures are executed in monarchical countries, if we reflect upon another of the evil confequences attendant upon this fpecies of government, the exiftence and corruption of courts.

Systematical monopoly of confidence. The character of this, as well as of every other human infitution, arifes out of the circumftances with which it is furrounded. Minifters and favourites are a fort of people who have a flate prifoner in their cuftody, the whole management of whofe underftanding and actions they can eafily engrofs. This they completely effect with a weak and credulous mafter, nor can the moft cautious and penetrating entirely elude their machinations. They unavoidably defire to continue in the adminiftration of his functions, whether it be emolument, or the love of homage, or any more generous motive by which they are attached attached to it. But the more they are confided in by the BOOK V. CHAP. V. fovereign, the greater will be the permanence of their fituation: and the more exclusive is their pofferfion of his ear, the more implicit will be his confidence. The wifeft of mortals are liable to error; the most judicious projects are open to specious and fuperficial objections; and it can rarely happen but a minister will find his eafe and fecurity in excluding as much as poffible other and oppofite advifers, whofe acuteness and ingenuity are perhaps additionally whetted by a defire to fucceed to his office.

OF COURTS AND MINISTERS.

Ministers become a fort of miniature kings in their turn. Character of Though they have the greatest opportunity of observing the impotence and unmeaningness of the character, they yet envy it. It is their trade perpetually to extol the dignity and importance of the mafter they ferve ; and men cannot long anxioufly endeavour to convince others of the truth of any propolition without becoming half convinced of it themfelves. They feel themfelves dependent for all that they most ardently defire upon this man's arbitrary will; but a fense of inferiority is perhaps the never failing parent of emulation or envy. They affimilate themfelves therefore of choice to a man to whofe circumftances their own are confiderably fimilar.

In reality the requifites, without which monarchical govern- of their dement cannot be preferved in existence, are by no means fuffi-minifters:

pendents.

ciently

OF COURTS

BOOK V. CHAP. V. ciently fupplied by the mere intervention of minifters. There must be the minifters of ministers, and a long bead roll of fubordination defeending by tedious and complicated steps. Each of these lives on the smile of the minister, as he lives on the smile of the fovereign. Each of these has his petty interests to manage, and his empire to employ under the guise of fervility. Each imitates the vices of his superior, and exacts from others the adulation he is obliged to pay.

It has already appeared that a king is neceffarily and almoft unavoidably a defpot in his heart. He has been ufed to hear those things only which were adapted to give him pleasure; and it is with a grating and uneasy fensation that he liftens to communications of a different fort. He has been ufed to unhefitating compliance; and it is with difficulty he can digeft exposfulation and opposition. Of confequence the honeft and virtuous character, whose principles are clear and unshaken, is least qualified for his fervice; he must either explain away the feverity of his principles, or he must give place to a more crafty and temporifing politician. The temporifing politician expects the fame pliability in others that he exhibits in himfelf; and the fault which he can least forgive is an ill timed and inaufpicious forupulofity.

Expecting this compliance from all the coadjutors and inftruments of his defigns, he foon comes to fet it up as a ftandard

5

AND MINISTERS.

by which to judge of the merit of all other men. He is deaf to every recommendation but that of a fitnefs for the fecret fervice of government, or a tendency to promote his interest and extend the fphere of his influence. The worft man with this argument in his favour will feem worthy of encouragement; the beft man who has no advocate but virtue to plead for him will be treated with fupercilioufnefs and neglect. It is true the genuine criterion of human defert can never be fuperfeded and reverfed. But it will appear to be reverfed, and appearance will produce many of the effects of reality. To obtain honour it will be thought neceffary to pay a fervile court to administration, to bear with unaltered patience their contumely and fcorn, to flatter their vices, and render ourfelves useful to their private gratification. To obtain honour it will be thought neceffary by affiduity and intrigue to make to ourfelves a party, to procure the recommendation of lords and the good word of women of pleafure and clerks in office. To obtain honour it will be thought neceffary to merit difgrace. The whole fcene confifts in hollownefs, duplicity and falfhood. The minister speaks fair to the man he defpifes, and the flave pretends a generous attachment, while he thinks of nothing but his perfonal intereft. That these principles are intersperfed under the worst governments with occafional deviations into better it would be folly to deny; that they do not form the great prevailing features whereever a court and a monarch are to be found it would be madnefa to affert.

417

BOOK V. CHAP. V.

The.

OF COURTS

BOOK V. CHAP. V. The fundamental difadvantage of fuch a form of government is, that it renders things of the moft effential importance fubject through fucceffive gradations to the caprice of individuals. The fuffrage of a body of electors will always bear a refemblance more or lefs remote to the public fentiment. The fuffrage of an individual will depend upon caprice, perfonal convenience or pecuniary corruption. If the king be himfelf inacceffible to injuftice, if the minifter difdain a bribe, yet the fundamental evil remains, that kings and minifters, fallible themfelves, muft upon a thoufand occafions depend upon the recommendation of others. Who will anfwer for thefe through all their claffes, officers of ftate and deputies of department, humble friends and officious valets, wives and daughters, concubines and confeffors ?

Venality of courts. It is fuppofed by many, that the exiftence of permanent hereditary diffinction is neceffary to the maintenance of order among beings fo imperfect as the human fpecies. But it is allowed by all, that permanent hereditary diffinction is a fiction of policy, not an ordinance of immutable truth. Wherever it exifts, the human mind, fo far as relates to political fociety, is prevented from fettling upon its true foundation. There is a perpetual ftruggle between the genuine fentiments of underftanding, which tell us that all this is an impofition, and the imperious voice of government, which bids us, Reverence and obey. In this unequal conteft, alarm and apprehension will perpetually haunt the minds, of those who exercise usurped power. In this artificial cial ftate of man powerful engines must be employed to prevent BOOK V. him from rifing to his true level. It is the bufinefs of the governors to perfuade the governed, that it is their interest to be flaves. They have no other means by which to create this fictitious intereft, but those which they derive from the perverted understandings and burdened property of the public, to be returned in titles, ribbands and bribes. Hence that fyftem of univerfal corruption without which monarchy could not exift.

AND MINISTERS.

It has fometimes been fuppofed that corruption is particularly Univerfality incident to a mixed government. "In fuch a government the ciple. people poffefs a certain portion of freedom; privilege finds its place as well as prerogative; a certain flurdinefs of manner and confcioufnefs of independence are the natives of these countries. The country gentleman will not abjure the dictates of his judgment without a valuable confideration. There is here more than one road to fuccess; popular favour is as fure a means of advancement as courtly patronage. In defpotic countries the people may be driven like fheep; however unfortunate is their condition, they know of no other, and they fubmit to it as an inevitable calamity. Their characteristic feature is a torpid dullnefs in which all the energies of man are forgotten. But in a country calling itfelf free the minds of the inhabitants are in a perturbed and reftless flate, and extraordinary means must be employed to calm their vehemence." It has fometimes happened to men whole hearts have been pervaded with the love of

CHAP. V.

of this prin-virtue,

OF COURTS

BOOK V. CHAP. V.

420

virtue, of which pecuniary profitution is the moft odious corruption, to prefer, while they have contemplated this picture, an acknowledged defpotifin to a flate of fpecious and imperfect liberty.

But this picture is not accurate. As much of it as relates to a mixed<sup>a</sup> government must be acknowledged to be true. But the features of defpotifm are much too favourably touched. Whether privilege be conceded by the forms of the conflitution or no, a whole nation cannot be kept ignorant of its force. No people were ever yet fo funk in flupidity as to imagine one man, becaufe he bore the appellation of a king, literally equal to a million. In a whole nation, as monarchical nations at leaft must be expected to be constituted, there will be nobility and yeomanry, rich and poor. There will be perfons who by their fituation, or their wealth, or their talents, form a middle rank between the monarch and the vulgar, and who by their confederacies and their intrigues can hold the throne in awe. Thefe men must be bought or defied. There is no disposition that clings fo clofe to defpotifm as inceffant terror and alarm. What elfe gave birth to the armies of fpies and the numerous flate prifons under the late government of France? The eye of the tyrant is never clofed. How numerous are the precautions and jealoufies that these terrors dictate? No man can go out or come into the country but he is watched. The prefs must iffue no productions that have not the imprimatur of government.

All

All coffee houfes and places of public refort are objects of BOOK V. attention. Twenty people cannot be collected together, unlefs for the purposes of fuperfitition, but it is immediately fufpected that they may be conferring about their rights. Is it to be fuppofed, that, where the means of jealoufy are employed, the means of corruption will be forgotten ? Were it fo indeed, the cafe would not be much improved. No picture can be more difguftful, no ftate of mankind more depreffing, than that in which a whole nation is held in obedience by the mere operation of fear, in which all that is most eminent among them, and that fhould give example to the reft, is prevented under the fevereft penalties from expreffing its real fentiments, and by neceffary confequence from forming any fentiments that are worthy to be expressed. But in reality fear was never employed for these purposes alone. No tyrant was ever so unfocial as to have no confederates in his guilt. This monftrous edifice will always be found fupported by all the various inftruments for perverting the human character, feverity, menaces, blandifhments, professions and bribes. To this it is in a great degree owing that monarchy is fo very coftly an eftablishment. It is the bufinefs of the defpot to diftribute his lottery of feduction into as many prizes as poffible. Among the confequences of a pecuniary polity thefe are to be reckoned the foremoft, that every man is fuppofed to have his price, and that, the corruption being managed in an underhand manner, many a man, who

OF COURTS AND MINISTERS.

422

BOOK V. CHAP. V. who appears a patriot, may be really a hireling; by which means virtue itfelf is brought into difcredit, is either regarded as mere folly and romance, or obferved with doubt and fufpicion, as the cloke of vices which are only the more humiliating the more they are concealed.

CHAP.

[ 423 ]

CHAP. VI.

OF SUBJECTS.

MONARCHY FOUNDED IN IMPOSTURE .- KINGS NOT EN-TITLED TO SUPERIORITY-INADEQUATE TO THE FUNC-TIONS THEY POSSESS .- MEANS BY WHICH THE IMPOS-TURE IS MAINTAINED-I. SPLENDOUR-2. EXAGGERA-TION .- THIS IMPOSTURE GENERATES --- I. INDIFFERENCE TO MERIT-2. INDIFFERENCE TO TRUTH-3. ARTIFICIAL DESIRES - 4. PUSILLANIMITY. - MORAL INCREDULITY OF MONARCHICAL COUNTRIES .---- INJUSTICE OF LUXURY -OF THE INORDINATE ADMIRATION OF WEALTH.

ET us proceed to confider the moral effects which the in- BOOK v. A flitution of monarchical government is calculated to produce upon the inhabitants of the countries in which it flourisches, founded in And here it must be laid down as a first principle that monarchy is founded in imposture. It is false that kings are entitled to Kings not the eminence they obtain. They poffels no intrinsic superiority fuperiority : over their fubjects. The line of diffinction that is drawn is the offspring of pretence, an indirect means employed for effecting certain purpoles, and not the offspring of truth. It tramples upon the genuine nature of things, and depends for its fupport upon entitled to

CHAP. VI. Monarchy impofture.

BOOK V. CHAP. VI. upon this argument, "that, were it not for impolitions of a fimilar nature, mankind would be miferable."

inadequate to the functions they poffefs.

Secondly, it is false that kings can discharge the functions of royalty. They pretend to fuperintend the affairs of millions. and they are neceffarily unacquainted with these affairs. The fenfes of kings are conftructed like those of other men, they can neither fee nor hear what is transacted in their abfence. They pretend to administer the affairs of millions, and they poffers no fuch fupernatural powers as fhould enable them to act at a They are nothing of what they would perfuade us to diftance. believe them. The king is often ignorant of that of which half the inhabitants of his dominions are informed. His prerogatives are administered by others, and the lowest clerk in office is frequently to this and that individual more effectually the fovereign than the king himfelf. He knows nothing of what is folemnly transacted in his name, Means by which the impofture is fupported : 1. fplendour : To conduct this impofure with fuccefs it is neceffary to bring over to its party our eyes and our ears. Accordingly kings are always exhibited with all the fplendour of ornament, attendance and equipage. They live amidft a fumptuoufnefs of expence; and this not merely to gratify their appetites, but as a neceffary inftrument of policy. The most fatal opinion that could lay hold upon the minds of their fubjects is that kings are but men. Accordingly they are carefully withdrawn from the profanenes of vulgar infpection; and, when they are exhibited, it is with BOOK V. every artifice that may dazzle our fenfe and millead our judgment.

of

The impofture does not ftop with our eyes, but addreffes 2. exaggeraitfelf to our ears. Hence the inflated ftyle of regal formality. The name of the king every where obtrudes itfelf upon us. It would feem as if every thing in the country, the lands, the houfes, the furniture and the inhabitants were his property. Our effates are the king's dominions. Our bodies and minds are his fubjects. Our reprefentatives are his parliament. Our courts of law are his deputies. All magiftrates throughout the realm are the king's officers. His name occupies the foremoft place in all flatutes and decrees. He is the profecutor of every criminal. He is "Our Sovereign Lord the King." Were it poffible that he fhould die, "the fountain of our blood, the means by which we live," would be gone: every political function would be fuspended. It is therefore one of the fundamental principles of monarchical government that " the king cannot die." Our moral principles accommodate themfelves to our veracity: and accordingly the fum of our political duties (the most important of all duties) is loyalty; to be true and faithful to the king; to honour a man, whom it may be we ought to defpife; and to obey; that is, to acknowledge no immutable criterion of justice and injustice.

3 I :

What :

BOOK V. CHAP. VI.

This impofture generates, 1. indifference to merit :

What must be the effects of this machine upon the moral principles of mankind ? Undoubtedly we cannot trifle with the principles of morality and truth with impunity. However gravely the impofture may be carried on, it is impoffible but that the real ftate of the cafe fhould be ftrongly fufpected. Man in a flate of fociety, if undebauched by falfhoods like thefe. which confound the nature of right and wrong, is not ignorant of what it is in which merit confifts. He knows that one man is not fuperior to another except fo far as he is wifer or better. Accordingly thefe are the diffinctions to which he afpires for himfelf. Thefe are the qualities he honours and applauds in another, and which therefore the feelings of each man infligate his neighbour to acquire. But what a revolution is introduced among thefe original and undebauched fentiments by the arbitrary diffinctions which monarchy engenders? We ftill retain in our minds the ftandard of merit, but it daily grows more feeble and powerlefs, we are perfuaded to think that it is of no real use in the transactions of the world, and prefently lay it aside as Utopian and vifionary.

2. indifference to truth : Confequences equally injurious are produced by the hyperbolical pretentions of monarchy. There is a fimplicity in truth that refufes alliance with this impudent myfticifm. No man is entirely ignorant of the nature of man. He will not indeed be incredulous to a degree of energy and rectitude that may exceed the ftandard of his preconceived ideas. But for one man to 5 pretend pretend to think and act for a nation of his fellows is fo prepofterous as to fet credibility at defiance. Is he perfuaded that the impofition is falutary? He willingly affumes the right of introducing fimilar falfhoods into his private affairs. He becomes convinced that veneration for truth is to be claffed among our errors and prejudices, and that, fo far from being, as it pretends to be, in all cafes falutary, it would lead, if ingenuoufly practifed, to the deftruction of mankind.

426

Again, if kings were exhibited fimply as they are in them- 3 artificial felves to the infpection of mankind, the falutary prejudice, as it has been called, which teaches us to venerate them, would fpeedily be extinct: it has therefore been found neceffary to furround them with luxury and expence. Thus are luxury and expence made the flandard of honour, and of confequence the topics of anxiety and envy. However fatal this fentiment may be to the morality and happiness of mankind, it is one of those illufions which monarchical government is eager to cherifh. In reality, the first principle of virtuous feeling, as has been elfewhere faid, is the love of independence. He that would be just must before all things estimate the objects about him at their But the principle in regal flates has been to think true value. your father the wifeft of men becaufe he is your father *, and your

* "The perfons whom you ought to love infinitely more than me, are those to whom you are indebted for your existence." "Their conduct ought to regu-3 I 2 late BOOK V. CHAP. VI.

BOOK V. CHAP. VI. your king the foremost of his species because he is a king. The standard of intellectual merit is no longer the man but his title. To be drawn in a coach of state by eight milk-white horses is the highest of all human claims to our veneration. The state principle inevitably runs through every order of the state, and men defire wealth under a monarchical government, for the fame reason that under other circumstances they would have defired virtue.

Let us fuppole an individual who by fevere labour earns a fcanty fublishence, to become by accident or curiofity a fpectator of the pomp of a royal progrefs. Is it poffible that he fhould not mentally apoftrophife this elevated mortal, and afk, "What has made thee to differ from me?" If no fuch fentiment pafs through his mind, it is a proof that the corrupt infitutions of fociety have already divefted him of all fense of juffice. The more fimple and direct is his character, the more certainly will thefe fentiments occur. What answer fhall we return to his enquiry? That the well being of fociety requires men to be treated otherwise than according to their intrinsic merit? Whe-

Lite yours and be the ftandard of your fentiments." "The refpect we owe to our father and mother is a fort of worfbip, as the phrafe filial piety implies." "Ce que vous devez aimer avant moi fans aucune comparaifon, ce font ceux à qui vous devez la vie." "Leur conduite doit regler la vôtre et fixer votre opinion." "Le refpect que nous devons à notre pere et à notre mere est un culte, comme l'exprime le mot piété filiale." Leçons d'une Gouvermante, Tome I.

4

ther

ther he be fatisfied with this anfwer or no, will he not affire to poffefs that (which in this inftance is wealth) to which the policy of mankind has annexed fuch high diffinction? Is it not indifpenfible, that, before he believes in the rectitude of this inftitution, his original feelings of right and wrong fhould be wholly reverfed? If it be indifpenfible, then let the advocate of the monarchical fyftem ingenuoufly declare, that, according to that fyftem, the intereft of fociety in the firft inftance requires the total fubverfion of all principles of moral truth and juffice.

With this view let us again recollect the maxim adopted in monarchical countries, "that the king never dies." Thus with true oriental extravagance we falute this imbecil mortal, "O king, live for ever !" Why do we this ? Becaufe upon his exiftence the existence of the state depends. In his name the courts of law are opened. If his political capacity be fufpended for a moment. the centre to which all public bufinefs is linked, is deftroyed. In fuch countries every thing is uniform : the ceremony is all, and the fubftance nothing. In the riots in the year 1780 the mace of the houfe of lords was proposed to be fent into the passages by the terror of its appearance to quiet the confusion; but it was obferved that, if the mace fhould be rudely detained by the rioters, the whole would be thrown into anarchy. Bufinefs would be at a ftand, their infignia, and with their infignia their legiflative and deliberative functions be gone. Who can expect firmnefs and energy in a country, where every thing is made to depend

BOOK V.

BOOK V. CHAP. VI. depend not upon juftice, public intereft and reafon, but upon a piece of gilded wood? What confcious dignity and virtue can there be among a people, who, if deprived of the imaginary guidance of one vulgar mortal, are taught to believe that their faculties are benumbed, and all their joints unftrung?

4. pufillanimity.

Laftly, one of the most effential ingredients in a virtuous character is undaunted firmnefs; and nothing can more powerfully tend to deftroy this principle than the fpirit of a monarchical government. The first lesson of virtue is, Fear no man; the first lesson of fuch a constitution is. Fear the king. The first leffon of virtue is, Obey no man *; the first leffon of monarchy is. Obey the king. The true intereft of mind demands the annihilation of all factitious and imaginary diffinctions; it is infeparable from monarchy to fupport and render them more He that cannot fpeak to the proudeft defpot palpable than ever. with a confcioufness that he is a man speaking to a man, and a determination to yield him no fuperiority to which his inherent qualifications do not entitle him, is wholly incapable of fublime virtue. How many fuch men are bred within the pale of monarchy? How long would monarchy maintain its ground in a nation of fuch men? Surely it would be the wifdom of fociety, inftead of conjuring up a thousand phantoms to induce us into error, instead of furrounding us with a thousand fears to deprive us of true energy, to remove every obftacle and fmooth the path of improvement.

* Book III, Chap. VI.

430

Virtue was never yet held in much honour and efteem in a Moral incremonarchical country. It is the inclination and the intereft of narohical courtiers and kings to bring it into difrepute; and they are but too fuccefsful in the attempt. Virtue is in their conception arrogant, intrusive, unmanageable and stubborn. It is an affumed outfide, by which those who pretend to it intend to gratify their rude tempers or their fecret views. Within the circle of monarchy virtue is always regarded with difhonourable incredulity. The philosophical fystem which affirms felf love to be the first mover of all our actions and the falfity of human virtues, is the growth of these countries*. Why is it that the language of integrity and public fpirit is conftantly regarded among us as hypocrify ? It was not always thus. It was not till the ufurpation of Cæfar, that books were written by the tyrant and his partifans to prove that Cato was no better than a fnarling pretender +.

There is a farther confideration, which has feldom been Injuffice of luxury : adverted to upon this fubject, but which feems to be of no in-* Maximes, par M. le Duc de la Rochefoucault : De la Fauffeté des Vertus Humaines, par M. Esprit.

+ See Plutarch's Lives; Lives of Carfar and Cicero: Ciceronis Epifiola ad Atticum, Lib. XII. Epift. XL, XLI.

confiderable

dulity of mocountries.

BOOK V. CHAP. VI.

432 BOOK V.

CHAP. VI.

confiderable importance. In our definition of juffice it appeared. that our debt to our fellow men extended to all the efforts we could make for their welfare, and all the relief we could fupply to their neceffities. Not a talent do we poffefs, not a moment of time, not a fhilling of property, for which we are not refponfible at the tribunal of the public, which we are not obliged to pay into the general bank of common advantage. Of every one of thefe things there is an employment which is beft, and that beft juffice obliges us to felect. But how extensive is the confequence of this principle with refpect to the luxuries and oftentation of human life? Are there many of thefe luxuries that will ftand the teft, and approve themfelves upon examination to be the beft objects upon which our property can be employed? Will it often come out to be true, that hundreds of individuals ought to be fubjected to the feverest and most incessant labour, that one man may fpend in idlenefs what would afford to the general mafs eafe, leifure, and confequently wifdom ?

of the inordinate admiration of wealth. Whoever frequents the habitation of the luxurious will fpeedily be infected with the vices of luxury. The minifters and attendants of a fovereign, accuftomed to the trappings of magnificence, will turn with difdain from the merit that is obfcured with the clouds of adverfity. In vain may virtue plead, in vain may talents folicit diffinction, if poverty feem to the faftidious fenfe of the man in place to envelop them as it were with with its noifome effluvia. The very lacquey knows how to BOOK V. CHAP. VI. repel unfortunate merit from the great man's door.

433

Here then we are prefented with the leffon which is loudly and perpetually read through all the haunts of monarchy. Money is the great requifite for the want of which nothing can atone. Diffinction, the homage and efteem of mankind, are to be bought, not earned. The rich man need not trouble himfelf to invite them, they come unbidden to his furly door. Rarely indeed does it happen, that there is any crime that gold cannot expiate, any bafenefs and meannefs of character that wealth cannot cover with oblivion. Money therefore is the only object worthy of your purfuit, and it is of little importance by what finister and unmanly means, fo it be but obtained.

It is true that virtue and talents do not fland in need of the great man's affiftance, and might, if they did but know their worth, repay his fcorn with a just and enlightened pity. But unfortunately they are too often ignorant of their ftrength, and adopt the errors they fee univerfally efpoufed in the world. Were it otherwife, they would indeed be happier, but the general manners would probably remain the fame. The general manners are fashioned by the form and spirit of the national government; and, if in extraordinary cafes they become difcordant, they fpeedily fubvert it.

The evils indeed that arife out of avarice, an inordinate admi-3 K ration BOOK V. CHAP. VI. ration of wealth and an intemperate purfuit of it, are fo obvious, that they have conflituted a perpetual topic of lamentation and complaint. The object in this place is to confider how far they are extended and aggravated by a monarchical government, that is, by a conflitution the very effence of which is to accumulate enormous wealth upon a fingle head, and to render the oftentation of fplendour the chofen inftrument for fecuring honour and veneration. The object is to confider in what degree the luxury of courts, the effeminate foftnels of favourites, the fyftem, never to be feparated from the monarchical form, of putting men's approbation and good word at a price, of individuals buying the favour of government, and government buying the favour of individuals, is injurious to the moral improvement of mankind. As long as the unvarying practice of courts is cabal, and as long as the unvarying tendency of cabal is to bear down talents, and difcourage virtue; to recommend cunning in the room of fincerity, a fervile and fupple difpolition in preference to firmnefs and inflexibility, a convenient morality as better than a ftrict one, and the fludy of the red book of promotion rather than the ftudy of general welfare, fo long will monarchy be the bittereft and most potent of all the adversaries of the true interefts of mankind.

434

[ 435 ]

C H A P. VII.

OF ELECTIVE MONARCHY.

DISORDERS ATTENDANT ON SUCH AN ELECTION.—ELEC-TION IS INTENDED EITHER TO PROVIDE A MAN OF GREAT OR OF MODERATE TALENTS.—CONSEQUENCES OF THE FIRST — OF THE SECOND.—CAN ELECTIVE AND HEREDITARY MONARCHY BE COMBINED?

HAVING confidered the nature of monarchy in general, it is incumbent on us to examine how far its mifchiefs may be qualified by rendering the monarchy elective.

BOOK V. CHAP.VII. Diforders attendant on fuch an election.

One of the most obvious objections to this remedy is the difficulty that attends upon the conduct of fuch an election. There are machines that are too mighty for the human hand to conduct; there are proceedings that are too gigantic and unwieldy for human inflitutions to regulate. The diffance between the mass of mankind and a fovereign is fo immense, the truft to be confided fo ineftimably great, the temptations of the object to be decided on fo alluring, as to fet every passion that can vex the mind in tumultous conflict. Election will therefore either dwindle into an empty form, a congé d'élire with the fuccessful candidate's name at full length in the conclusion, an election perpetually continued in the fame family, perhaps in the fame lineal order of defcent; or will become the fignal of a thoufand calamities, foreign cabal and domeftic war. Thefe evils have been fo generally underftood, that elective monarchy in the first fenfe of that appellation has very few advocates.

OF ELECTIVE MONARCHY.

436 воок v.

CHAP.VII.

Rouffeau, who in his advice to the Polifh nation appears to be one of those few, that is, one of those who without loving monarchy conceive an elective fovereignty greatly preferable to an hereditary one, endeavours to provide against the diforders of an election by introducing into it a species of fortition*. In another part of the prefent enquiry it will be our business to examine how far chance and the decision by lot are compatible with the principles either of found morality or sober reason. For the prefent it will be sufficient to fay, that the project of Rouffeau will probably fall under one part of the following dilemma, and of confequence will be refuted by the fame arguments that bear upon the mode of election in its most obvious idea.

The defign of election is either to provide an officer of great or of moderate talents. The defign with which election can be introduced into the confliction of a monarchy muft either be that of raifing to the kingly office a man of fuperlative talents and uncommon genius, or of providing a moderate portion of wifdom and good intention for the difcharge of these functions, and preventing them from

* Confidérations fur le Gouvernement de Pologne, Chap. VIII.

8

OF ELECTIVE MONARCHY.

from falling to the lot of perfons of notorious imbecility. the first of these defigns it will be objected by many, "that genius is frequently nothing more in the hands of its poffeffor quences of the first : than an inftrument for accomplishing the most pernicious intentions." And, though in this affertion there is much partial and miftaken exaggeration, it cannot however be denied that genius, fuch as we find it amidst the prefent imperfections of mankind, is compatible with very ferious and effential errors. If then genius can by temptations of various forts be led into practical miftake, may we not reafonably entertain a fear respecting the effect of that fituation which of all others is most pregnant with temptation ? If confiderations of inferior note be apt to miflead the mind, what shall we think of this most intoxicating draught, of a condition fuperior to reftraint, flripped of all those accidents and viciffitudes from which the morality of human beings has flowed, with no falutary check, with no intellectual warfare where mind meets mind on equal terms, but perpetually furrounded with fycophants, fervants and dependents? To fuppofe a mind in which genius and virtue are united and permanent, is also undoubtedly to suppose fomething which no calculation will teach us to expect fhould offer upon every vacancy. And, if the man could be found, we must imagine to ourselves electors almost as virtuous as the elected, or elfe error and prejudice, faction and intrigue will render his election at least precarious, perhaps improbable. Add to this that it is fufficiently evident from the unalterable evils of monarchy already enumerated,

To BOOK V. CHAP.VII.

OF ELECTIVE MONARCHY.

BOOK V. CHAP.VII. rated, and which I fhall prefently have occafion to recapitulate, that the first act of fovereignty in a virtuous monarch, whofe difcernment was equal to his virtue, would be to annihilate the conflictution, which had raifed him to a throne.

But we will suppose the purpose of inflituting an elective of the fecond. monarchy not to be that of conftantly filling the throne with a man of fublime genius, but merely to prevent the fovereignty from falling to the lot of perfons of notorious mental imbecility. Such is the ftrange and pernicious nature of monarchy, that it may be doubted whether this be a benefit. Wherever monarchy exifts, courts and administrations must, as long as men can fee only with their eyes and act only with their hands, be its conftant attendants. But thefe have already appeared to be inftitutions fo mifchievous, that perhaps one of the greatest injuries that can be done to mankind is to perfuade them of their innocence. Under the most virtuous despot favour and intrigue, the unjust exaltation of one man and depreffion of another will not fail to exift. Under the most virtuous despot the true spring there is in mind, the defire to poffels merit, and the confcioufnels that merit will not fail to make itfelf perceived by those around it, and through their efteem to rife to its proper fphere, will be cut off; and mean and factitious motives be fubfituted in its room. Of what confequence is it that my merit is perceived by mortals who have no power to advance it? The monarch, fhut up in his fanctuary and furrounded with formalities, will never hear of it.

OF ELECTIVE MONARCHY

How fhould he? Can he know what is paffing in the it. remote corners of his kingdom? Can he trace the first timid bloffoms of genius and virtue? The people themfelves will lofe their difcernment of thefe things, becaufe they will perceive their difcernment to be powerlefs in effects. The offspring of mind is daily facrificed by hecatombs to the genius of monarchy. The feeds of reafon and truth become barren and unproductive in this unwholefome climate. And the example perpetually exhibited of the preference of wealth and craft over integrity and talents, produces the most powerful effects upon that mass of mankind, who at first fight may appear least concerned in the objects of generous ambition. This mifchief, to whatever it amounts, becomes more ftrongly fastened upon us under a good monarch than under a bad one. In the latter cafe it only reftrains our efforts by violence, in the former it feduces our understandings. To palliate the defects and fkin over the deformity of what is fundamentally wrong, is certainly very perilous, perhaps very fatal to the beft interefts of mankind.

A queftion has been flarted, whether it be poffible to blend Can elective elective and hereditary monarchy, and the conflictution of England has been cited as an example of this poffibility. What was it that the parliament effected at the revolution, and when they fettled the fucceffion upon the houfe of Hanover? They elected not an individual, but a new race of men to fill the throne of these kingdoms. They gave a practical instance of their and hereditary monarchy be combined ?

BOOK V. CHAP.VII

OF ELECTIVE MONARCHY.

440

4

BOOK V. CHAP.VII. their power upon extraordinary emergencies to change the fucceffion. At the fame time however that they effected this in action, they denied it in words. They employed the ftrongeft expressions that language could furnish to bind themselves, their heirs and posterity for ever to adhere to this fettlement. They confidered the present as an emergence, which, taking into the account the precautions and restrictions they had provided, could never occur again.

In reality what fort of fovereignty is that which is partly hereditary and partly elective ? That the acceffion of a family or race of men fhould originally be a matter of election has nothing particular in it. All government is founded in opinion; and undoubtedly fome fort of election, made by a body of electors more or lefs extensive, originated every new eftablishment. To whom in this amphibious government does the fovereignty belong upon the death of the first possible of the fovereignty belong upon the death of the first possible of the key and defeendants. What fort of choice shall that be confidered, which is made of a man half a century before he begins to exist? By what defignation does he fucceed? Undoubtedly by that of hereditary defeent. A king of England therefore holds his crown independently, or, as it has been energetically expressed, "in contempt" of the choice of the people *.

* This argument is flated with great copioufnefs and irrefiftible force of reafoning by Mr. Burke towards the beginning of his Reflections on the Revolution in France.

441

CHAP. VIII.

OF LIMITED MONARCHY.

LIABLE TO MOST OF THE PRECEDING OBJECTIONS-TO FARTHER OBJECTIONS PECULIAR TO ITSELF .-- RESPON-SIBILITY CONSIDERED .- MAXIM, THAT THE KING CAN DO NO WRONG .- FUNCTIONS OF A LIMITED MONARCH.-IMPOSSIBILITY OF MAINTAINING THE NEUTRALITY RE-OUIRED.-OF THE DISMISSION OF MINISTERS.-RESPON-SIBILITY OF MINISTERS .- APPOINTMENT OF MINISTERS. ITS IMPORTANCE --- ITS DIFFICULTIES. --- RECAPITULA-TION .- STRENGTH AND WEAKNESS OF THE HUMAN SPECIES.

PROCEED to confider monarchy, not as it exifts in BOOK V. countries where it is unlimited and defpotic, but, as in certain inflances it has appeared, a branch merely of the general conflictution.

Here it is only neceffary to recollect the objections which Liable to applied to it in its unqualified flate, in order to perceive that they preceding bear upon it with the fame explicitnefs, if not with equal force, under every poffible modification. Still the government is moft of the objections;

founded

BOOK V. CHAP. VIII. founded in falfhood, affirming that a certain individual is eminently qualified for an important fituation, whole qualifications are perhaps fcarcely fuperior to those of the meanest member of the community. Still the government is founded in injuffice, becaufe it raifes one man for a permanent duration over the heads of the reft of the community, not for any moral recommendation he poffeffes, but arbitrarily and by accident. Still it reads a conftant and powerful leffon of immorality to the people at large, exhibiting pomp and fplendour and magnificence inftead of virtue, as the index to general veneration and efteem. The individual is, not lefs than in the most absolute monarchy, unfitted by his education to become either refpectable or ufeful. He is unjuftly and cruelly placed in a fituation that engenders ignorance, weaknefs and prefumption, after having been ftripped in his infancy of all the energies that fhould defend him against the inroads of these adversaries. Finally, his existence implies that of a train of courtiers and a feries of intrigue, of fervility, fecret influence, capricious partialities and pecuniary corruption. So true is the obfervation of Montesquieu, that "we must not expect under a monarchy to find the people virtuous*."

to farther ohjections peculiar to itfelf. But if we confider the queftion more narrowly, we fhall perhaps find, that limited monarchy has other abfurdities and vices which are peculiarly its own. In an abfolute fovereignty the king may if he pleafe be his own minister; but in a li- BOOK v. mited one a ministry and a cabinet are effential parts of the conflitution. In an abfolute fovereignty princes are acknowledged to be refponfible only to God; but in a limited one there is a refponfibility of a very different nature. In a limited monarchy there are checks, one branch of the government counteracting the exceffes of another, and a check without refponfibility is the moft flagrant of all contradictions.

* "Il n'est pas rare qu'il y ait des princes vertueux ; mais il est très difficile dans une monarchie que le peuple le foit." Esprit des Loix, Liv. III, Chap. V.

442

There is no fubject that deferves to be more maturely con- Refponfifidered than this of refponfibility. To be refponfible is to be fidered. liable to be called into an open judicature, where the accufer and the defendant produce their allegations and evidence on equal terms. Every thing fhort of this is mockery. Every thing that would give to either party any other influence than that of truth and virtue is fubverfive of the great ends of juffice. He that is -arraigned of any crime must defcend a private individual to the level plain of juffice. If he can bias the fentiments of his judges by his poffeffion of power, or by any compromife previous to his refignation, or by the mere fympathy excited in his fucceffors, who will not be fevere in their cenfures, left they fhould be treated with feverity in return, he cannot truly be faid to be refponfible at From the honeft infolence of defpotifm we may perhaps all. promife ourfelves better effects, than from the hypocritical difclaimers of a limited government. Nothing can be more pernicious than falfhood, and no falfhood can be more palpable bility con-

3 L 2

than

CHAP. VIII.

BOOK V. CHAP. VIII. than that which pretends to put a weapon into the hands of the general intereft, which conftantly proves blunt and powerlefs in the very act to ftrike.

Maxim, that the king can do no wrong. It was a confufed feeling of these truths, that introduced into limited monarchies the principle "that the king can do no wrong." Observe the peculiar confistency of this proceeding. Confider what a specimen it affords us of plain dealing, frankness and unalterable sincerity. An individual is first appointed, and endowed with the most momentous prerogatives, and then it is pretended that, not he, but other men are answerable for the abuse of these prerogatives. This pretence may appear tolerable to men bred among the fictions of law, but justice, truth and virtue revolt from it with indignation.

Functions of a limited monarch. Having first invented this fiction, it becomes the business of fuch constitutions as nearly as possible to realife it. A ministry must be regularly formed; they must concert together; and the measures they execute must originate in their own differentian. The king must be reduced as nearly as possible to a cypher. So far as he fails to be completely fo, the constitution must be imperfect.

What fort of figure is it that this miferable wretch exhibits in the face of the world? Every thing is with great parade tranfacted in his name. He affumes all the inflated and oriental ftyle which has been already defcribed, and which indeed was upon that occasion transcribed from the practice of a limited monarchy. We find him like Pharaoh's frogs "in our houfes and upon our beds, in our ovens and our kneading troughs,"

that

:444

Now obferve the man himfelf to whom all this importance is annexed. To be idle is the abftract of all his duties. Heis paid an immenfe revenue only to dance and to eat, to wear a fcarlet robe and a crown. He may not choose any one of his measures. He must listen with docility to the confultations of his minifters, and fanction with a ready affent whatever they determine. He must not hear any other advisers, for they are his known and conflitutional counfellors. He muft not express to any man his opinion, for that would be a finister and unconflitutional interference. To be abfolutely perfect he muft have no opinion, but be the vacant and colourlefs mirror by which theirs is reflected. He fpeaks, for they have taught him what he fhould fay; he affixes his fignature, for they inform him that it is neceffary and proper.

A limited monarchy in the articles I have defcribed might be Impoffibility executed with great facility and applaufe, if a king were what ing the neufuch a conftitution endeavours to render him, a mere puppet quired. regulated by pullies and wires. But it is perhaps the most egregious and palpable of all political miftakes to imagine that we can reduce a human being to this flate of neutrality and torpor. He will not exert any useful and true activity, but he б will of maintaintrality re-

BOOK V. CHAP. VIII.

BOOK V. Chap. VIII.

446

will be far from paffive. The more he is excluded from that energy that characterifes wildom and virtue, the more depraved and unreafonable will he be in his caprices. Is any promotion vacant, and do we expect that he will never think of beftowing it on a favourite, or of proving by an occafional election of his own that he really exifts? This promotion may happen to be of the utmoft importance to the public welfare; or, if not;—every promotion unmeritedly given is pernicious to national virtue, and an upright minifter will refufe to affent to it. A king does not fail to hear his power and prerogatives extolled, and he will no doubt at fome time wifh to effay their reality in an unprovoked war againft a foreign nation or againft his own citizens.

To fuppofe that a king and his minifters fhould through a period of years agree in their genuine fentiments upon every public topic, is what human nature in no degree authorifes. This is to attribute to the king talents equal to those of the most enlightened ftates from, or at least to imagine him capable of understanding all their projects, and comprehending all their views. It is to suppose him unspoiled by education, undebauched by rank, and with a mind ingenuously disposed to receive the impartial lessons of truth.

Of the difmiffion of minifters. "But, if they difagree, the king can choose other ministers." We shall prefently have occasion to confider this prerogative in a general view; let us for the present examine it in its application to the differences that may occur between the fovercign and BOOK V. his fervants. It is an engine for ever fufpended over the heads of the latter to perfuade them to depart from the fternnefs of their integrity. The compliance that the king demands from them is perhaps at first but fmall; and the minister, strongly preffed, thinks it better to facrifice his opinion in this inferior point than to facrifice his office. One compliance of this fort leads on to another, and he that began perhaps only with the preference of an unworthy candidate for diffinction ends with the moft atrocious political guilt. The more we confider this point, the greater will its magnitude appear. It will rarely happen but that the minister will be more dependent for his existence on the king, than the king upon his minifter. When it is otherwife, there will be a mutual compromife, and both in turn will part with every thing that is firm, generous, independent and honourable in man.

And in the mean time what becomes of refponfibility? The Refponfibimeafures are mixed and confounded as to their fource, beyond fters. the power of human ingenuity to unravel. Refponfibility is in "Far otherwife," cries the advocate of reality impoffible. monarchical government: "it is true that the meafures are partly those of the king and partly those of the minister, but the minifter is refponfible for all." Where is the juffice of that? It were better to leave guilt wholly without cenfure, than to condemn a man for crimes of which he is innocent. In this cafe the grand criminal efcapes with impunity, and the feverity of lity of mini-

CHAP. VI

BOOK V. CHAP. VIII.

of the law falls wholly upon his coadjutors. The coadjutors receive that treatment which conftitutes the effence of all bad policy: punifhment is profufely menaced against them, and antidote is wholly forgotten. They are propelled to vice by irrefiftible temptations, the love of power and the defire to retain it; and then cenfured with a rigour altogether difproportioned to their fault. The vital principle of the fociety is tainted with injuffice, and the fame neglect of equity and partial respect of perfons will extend itfelf over the whole.

Appointment of minillers, its importance. I proceed to confider that prerogative in limited monarchy, which, whatever others may be given or denied, is infeparable from its fubfrance, the prerogative of the king to nominate to public offices. If any thing be of importance, furely this muft be of importance, that fuch a nomination be made with wifdom and integrity, that the fitteft perfons be appointed to the higheft trufts the frate has to confer, that an honeft and generous ambition be cherifhed, and that men who fhall moft ardently qualify themfelves for the care of the public welfare be fecure of having the largeft fhare in its fuperintendence.

Its difficulties. This nomination is a moft arduous tafk, and requires the warieft circumfpection. It approaches more nearly than any other affair of political fociety to the exercise of differentiation. In all other cafes the line of rectitude feems visible and diffinct. Juffice in the contefts of individuals, juffice in queftions of peace and and war, juffice in the ordination of law, will not obflinately withdraw itfelf from the refearch of an impartial and judicious enquirer. But to obferve the various portions of capacity fcattered through a nation, and minutely to decide among the qualifications of innumerable pretenders, muft after all our accuracy be committed to fome degree of uncertainty.

The first difficulty that occurs is to discover those whom genius and ability have made in the best fense candidates for the office. Ability is not always intrusive; talents are often to be found in the remoteness of a village, or the obscurity of a garret. And, though fels conscious field possible for a to a certain degree the attributes of genius, yet there are many things beside false modesty, that may teach its possible for to thun the air of a court.

Of all men a king is leaft qualified to penetrate thefe receffes, and difcover merit in its hiding place. Encumbered with forms, he cannot mix at large in the fociety of his fpecies. He is too much engroffed with the femblance of bufinefs or a fucceffion of amufements to have leifure for fuch obfervations as fhould afford a juft effimate of men's characters. In reality the tafk is too mighty for any individual, and the benefit can only be fecured by the mode of election.

Other difadvantages attendant on this prerogative of choofing 3 M his

BOOK V.

BOOK V. CHAP.VIII.

450

his own minifters it is needlefs to enumerate. If enough have not been already faid to explain the character of a monarch as growing out of the functions with which he is invefted, a laboured repetition in this place would be both tedious and vain. If there be any dependence to be placed upon the operation of moral caufes, a king will in almost every instance be found among the most undiferiminating, the most deceived, the least informed and the least heroically difinterested of mankind.

Recapitulation. Such then is the genuine and uncontrovertible fcene of a mixed monarchy. An individual placed at the fummit of the edifice, the centre and the fountain of honour, and who is neutral, or must feem neutral in the current transactions of his government. This is the first leffon of honour, virtue and truth, which mixed monarchy reads to its fubjects. Nexe to the king come his administration and the tribe of courtiers; men driven by a fatal neceffity to be corrupt, intriguing and venal; felected for their trust by the most ignorant and ill informed of their countrymen; made folely accountable for meafures of which they cannot folely be the authors; threatened, if difhoneft, with the furer vengeance of an injured people; and, if honeft, with the furer vengeance of their fovereign's difpleafure. The reft of the nation, the fubjects at large—

Was ever a name fo fraught with degradation and meannefs as this of fubjects? I am, it feems, by the very place of my birth become become a fubject. Of what, or whom ? Can an honeft man confider himfelf as the fubject of any thing but the laws of juffice? Can he acknowledge a fuperior, or hold himfelf bound to fubmit his judgment to the will of another, not lefs liable than himfelf to prejudice and error ? Such is the idol that monarchy worfhips in lieu of the divinity of truth and the facred obligation of public good. It is of little confequence whether we vow fidelity to the king and the nation, or to the nation and the king, fo long as the king intrudes himfelf to tarnifh and undermine the true fimplicity, the altar of virtue.

Are mere names beneath our notice, and will they produce no finister influence upon the mind? May we bend the knee before the fhrine of vanity and folly without injury? Far other-Mind had its beginning in fenfation, and it depends upon wife. words and fymbols for the progrefs of its affociations. The true good man muft not only have a heart refolved, but a front erect. We cannot practife abjection, hypocrify and meannefs, without becoming degraded in other men's eyes and in our own. We cannot "bow the head in the temple of Rimmon," without in fome degree apoftatifing from the divinity of truth. He that calls a king a man, will perpetually hear from his own mouth the leffon, that he is unfit for the truft repofed in him : he that calls him by any fublimer appellation, is haftening fast into the most palpable and dangerous errors.

BOOK V. Chap. VIII.

451

BOOK V. CHAP. VIII. Strength and weaknefs of the human fpecies.

But perhaps "mankind are fo weak and imbecil, that it is in vain to expect from the change of their inftitutions the improvement of their character." Who made them weak and imbecil? Previoully to human inftitutions they had certainly none of this defect. Man confidered in himfelf is merely a being capable of impreffion, a recipient of perceptions. What is there in this abstract character that precludes him from advancement? We have a faint discovery in individuals at prefent of what our nature is capable : why fhould individuals be fit for fo much, and the fpecies for nothing? Is there any thing in the ftructure of the globe that forbids us to be virtuous? If no, if nearly all our impreffions of right and wrong flow from our intercourfe with each other, why may not that intercourfe be fusceptible of modification and amendment? It is the most cowardly of all fyftems that would reprefent the difcovery of truth as ufelefs, and teach us that, when difcovered, it is our wifdom to leave the mafs of our fpecies in error.

There is not in reality the fmalleft room for fcepticifm refpecting the omnipotence of truth. Truth is the pebble in the lake; and however flowly in the prefent cafe the circles fucceed each other, they will infallibly go on till they overfpread the furface. No order of mankind will for ever remain ignorant of the principles of juffice, equality and public good. No fooner will they underftand them, than they will perceive the coincidence of virtue and public good with private intereft: nor will any erroneous erroneous establishment be able effectually to support itself against general opinion. In this contest fophistry will vanish. and mifchievous inftitutions fink quietly into neglect. Truth will bring down all her forces, mankind will be her army, and oppreffion, injuffice, monarchy and vice will tumble into a common ruin.

453

BOOK V. CHAP, VIII,

[ 454 ]

CHAP. IX.

OF A PRESIDENT WITH REGAL POWERS.

ENUMERATION OF POWERS—THAT OF APPOINTING TO INFERIOR OFFICES — OF PARDONING OFFENCES — OF CONVOKING DELIBERATIVE ASSEMBLIES—OF AFFIXING A VETO TO THEIR DECREES.—CONCLUSION.—THE TITLE OF KING ESTIMATED.—MONARCHICAL AND ARISTO-CRATICAL SYSTEMS, SIMILARITY OF THEIR EFFECTS.

DOOK V. CHAP. IX. STILL monarchy it feems has one refuge left. "We will not," fay fome men, "have an hereditary monarchy, we acknowledge that to be an enormous injuffice. We are not contented with an elective monarchy, we are not contented with a limited one. We admit the office however reduced, if the tenure be for life, to be an intolerable grievance. But why not have kings, as we have magiftrates and legiflative affemblies, renewable by frequent elections? We may then change the holder of the office as often as we pleafe."

Enumeration of powers: Let us not be feduced by a mere plaufibility of phrafe, nor employ words without having reflected on their meaning. What

OF A PRESIDENT WITH REGAL POWERS.

What are we to underftand by the appellation, a king? If the office have any meaning, it feems reafonable that the man who holds it, fhould poffers the privilege, either of appointing to certain employments at his own difcretion, or of remitting the decrees of criminal juffice, or of convoking and difmiffing popular affemblies, or of affixing and refufing his fanction to the decrees of those affemblies. Most of these privileges may claim a respectable authority in the powers delegated to their prefident by the United States of America.

Let us however bring these ideas to the touchstone of reason. Nothing can appear more adventurous than the repofing, unlefs in cafes of abfolute neceffity, the decifion of any affair of importance to the public, in the breaft of one man. But this neceffity will fcarcely be alledged in any of the articles just enumerated. What advantage does one man poffefs over a fociety or council of men in any of these respects? The difadvantages under which he labours are obvious. He is more eafily corrupted, and more eafily mifled. He cannot poffels fo many advantages for obtaining accurate information. He is abundantly more liable to the attacks of paffion and caprice, of unfounded antipathy to one man and partiality to another, of uncharitable cenfure or blind idolatry. He cannot be always upon his guard; there will be moments in which the most exemplary vigilance is liable to furprife. Meanwhile we are placing the fubject in much too 6 favourable that of appointing to inferior offices :

BOOK V.

OF A PRESIDENT

456

BOOK V. CHAP. IX.

favourable a light. We are fuppofing his intentions to be upright and juft; but the contrary of this will be more frequently the truth. Where powers beyond the capacity of human nature are intrufted, vices the difgrace of human nature will be engendered. Add to this, that the fame reafons, which prove that government, wherever it exifts, fhould be directed by the fenfe of the people at large, equally prove that, wherever public officers are neceffary, the fenfe of the whole, or of a body of men moft nearly approaching in fpirit to the whole, ought to decide on their pretenfions.

of pardoning offences :

of convoking deli-

berative affemblies : Thefe objections are applicable to the moft innocent of the privileges above enumerated, that of appointing to the exercife of certain employments. The cafe will be flill worfe if we confider the other privileges. We fhall have occafion hereafter to examine the propriety of pardoning offences, confidered independently of the perfons in whom that power is vefted: but, in the mean time, can any thing be more intolerable than for a fingle individual to be authorifed, without affigning a reafon, or affigning a reafon upon which no one is allowed to pronounce, to fuperfede the grave decifions of a court of juffice, founded upon a careful and public examination of evidence? Can any thing be more unjuft than for a fingle individual to affume the function of informing a nation when they are to deliberate, and when they are to ceafe from deliberation?

I

The

WITH REGAL POWERS.

The remaining privilege is of too iniquitous a nature to be an object of much terror. It is not in the compass of credibility to conceive, that any people would remain quiet fpectators, while the fenfe of one man was openly and undifguifedly fet against the fenfe of the national reprefentative in frequent affembly, and fuffered to overpower it. Two or three direct inftances of the exercife of this negative could not fail to annihilate it for ever. Accordingly, wherever it is fuppofed to exift, we find it foftened and nourifhed by the genial dew of pecuniary corruption; either rendered unneceffary beforehand by a finister application to the frailty of individual members, or difarmed and made palatable in the fequel by a copious effusion of venal emollients. If it can in any cafe be endured, it must be in countries where the degenerate reprefentative no longer poffeffes the fympathy of the public, and the haughty prefident is made facred, by the blood of an exalted anceftry which flows through his veins, or the holy oil which the reprefentatives of the Moft High have poured on his head. A common mortal, periodically felected by his fellowcitizens to watch over their interests, can never be fuppofed to poffefs this flupendous virtue.

If there be any truth in these reasonings, it inevitably follows Conclusion. that there are no important functions of general fuperintendence that can juftly be delegated to a fingle individual. If the office of a prefident be neceffary, either in a deliberative affembly or an administrative council, supposing such a council to exist, his employment

3 N

457

In 1870 amely oliver

BOOK V. CHAP.1X.

of affixing a weto to their decrees.

OF A PRESIDENT

BOOK V. CHAP. IX. employment will have relation to the order of their proceedings, and by no means confift in the arbitrary preferring and carrying into effect his private decifion. A king, if unvarying ufage can have given meaning to a word, defigns a man upon whofe fingle diferetion fome part of the public intereft is made to depend. What ufe can there be for fuch a man in an unperverted and well ordered flate? With refpect to its internal affairs certainly none. How far the office can be of advantage in our tranfactions with foreign governments we fhall hereafter have occafion to decide.

The title of the king eftimated. Let us beware by an unjuftifiable perversion of terms of confounding the common understanding of mankind. A king is the well known and standing appellation for an office, which, if there be any truth in the arguments of the preceding chapters, has been the bane and the grave of human virtue. Why endeavour to purify and exorcife what is entitled only to execration? Why not fuffer the term to be as well understood and as cordially detested, as the once honourable appellation of tyrant afterwards was among the Greeks? Why not fuffer it to rest a perpetual monument of the folly, the cowardice and misery of our species?

Monarchical and ariftoeratical IN proceeding from the examination of monarchical to that of ariftocratical government, it is impoffible not to remark that there there are feveral difadvantages common to both. One of thefe BOOK v. is the creation of a feparate intereft. The benefit of the governed is made to lie on one fide, and the benefit of the governors on the other. It is to no purpofe to fay that individual intereft accurately underftood will always be found to coincide with general, if it appear in practice, that the opinions and errors of mankind are perpetually feparating them and placing them in opposition to each other. The more the governors are fixed in a fphere diftinct and diftant from the governed, the more will Theory, in order to produce an this error be cherifhed. adequate effect upon the mind, fhould be favoured, not counteracted, by practice. What principle in human nature is more univerfally confeffed than felf love, that is, than a propenfity to think individually of a private intereft, to diferiminate and divide objects which the laws of the universe have indiffolubly united ? None, unlefs it be the efprit de corps, the tendency of bodies of men to aggrandife themfelves, a fpirit, which, though lefs ardent than felf love, is fill more vigilant, and not exposed to the accidents of fleep, indifpolition and mortality. Thus it appears that, of all impulses to a narrow, felf-interefted conduct. those afforded by monarchy and ariftocracy are the greatest.

Nor muft we be too hafty and undiffinguishing in applying the principle, that individual intereft accurately underftood will always be found to coincide with general. Relatively to individuals confidered as men it is true; relatively to individuals 3 N 2 confidered CHAP. IX.

lyftems, fimi-

larity of their effeðs.

OF A PRESIDENT WITH REGAL POWERS.

BOOK V. CHAP. IX.

460

confidered as lords and kings it is falfe. The man will be ferved by the facrifice of all his little peculium to the public intereft, but the king will be annihilated. The first facrifice that juffice demands at the hand of monarchy and ariftocracy, is that of their immunities and prerogatives. Public interest dictates the laborious differination of truth and the impartial administration of juffice. Kings and lords subsist only under favour of error and oppression. They will therefore result the progress of knowledge and illumination; the moment the deceit is dispelled, their occupation is gone.

In thus concluding however we are taking for granted that ariftocracy will be found an arbitrary and pernicious inftitution, as monarchy has already appeared to be. It is time that we should enquire in what degree this is actually the cafe.

F 461 7

CHAP. X.

OF HEREDITARY DISTINCTION.

BIRTH CONSIDERED AS A PHYSICAL CAUSE-AS A MORAL CAUSE.---ARISTOCRATICAL ESTIMATE OF THE HUMAN SPECIES .- EDUCATION OF THE GREAT .- RECAPITULA-TION.

PRINCIPLE deeply interwoven with both monarchy and ariftocracy in their most flourishing state, but most deeply with the latter, is that of hereditary preheminence. No fidered as a principle can prefent a deeper infult upon reafon and juffice. caufe: Examine the new born fon of a peer and a mechanic. Has nature defignated in different lineaments their future fortune? Is one of them born with callous hands and an ungainly form ? Can you trace in the other the early promife of genius and understanding, of virtue and honour? We have been told indeed. that "nature will break out "," and that book v. CHAP Y Birth conphyfical

"The eaglet of a valiant neft will quickly tower Up to the region of his fire *;"

and the tale was once believed. But mankind will not foon again be perfuaded, that one lineage of human creatures produces beauty and virtue, and another vice.

* Tragedy of Douglas, Act iii.

ВООК V. СНАР. Х.

402

An affertion thus bold and unfounded will quickly be refuted if we confider the queftion a priori. Mind is the creature of fenfation; we have no other inlet of knowledge. What are the fenfations that the lord experiences in his mother's womb, by which his mind is made different from that of the peafant? Is there any variation in the finer reticulated fubftance of the brain, by which the lord is adapted to receive clearer and ftronger imprefilions than the hufbandman or the finith?

"But a generous blood circulates in his heart and enriches his veins." What are we to underftand by this hypothefis? Men's actions are the creatures of their perceptions. He that apprehends most strongly will act most intrepidly. He, in whose mind truth is most distinctly impressed, who, understanding its nature, is best aware of its value, will speak with the most heartfelt perfuafion, and write with the greateft brilliancy and energy. By intrepidity and firmness in action we must either understand the judicious and deliberate conftancy of a Regulus or a Cato, or the brute courage of a private foldier, which is ftill an affair of mind, confifting in a flight eftimate of life which affords him few pleafures, and a thoughtlefs and flupid oblivion of danger. What has the blood to do with this ?-Health is undoubtedly in most cases the prerequisite of the best exertions of mind. But health itself is a mere negation, the absence of difease. A man must have experienced or imagined the inconveniences of ficknefs, before he can derive positive pleasure from the enjoyment

6

of

Again, however extravagant we may be in our eftiof health. mate of the benefit of health, is it true in fact that the lord enjoys a more vigorous health, experiences a more uniform chearfulnefs, and is lefs a prey to wearinefs and languor than the ruftic? High birth may infpire high thoughts as a moral caufe; but is it credible that it fhould operate inftinctively and when its exiftence is unknown, while, with every external advantage to affift, the nobleft families fo often produce the moft degenerate fons? Into its value then as a moral caufe let us proceed to enquire.

The perfuafion of its excellence in this refpect is an opinion as a moral probably as old as the inflitution of nobility itfelf. The very etymology of the word expressing this particular form of government is built upon this idea. It is called ariftocracy or the government of the beft  $[\alpha \rho i \tau \sigma i]$ . In the writings of Cicero and the fpeeches of the Roman fenate this order of men is ftyled the "optimates," the "virtuous," the "liberal," and the "honeft." It is taken for granted, "that the multitude is an unruly beaft. with no fenfe of honour or principle, guided by fordid intereft or not lefs fordid appetite, envious, tyrannical, inconftant and unjuft." From hence they deduced as a confequence, "the neceffity of maintaining an order of men of liberal education and elevated fentiments, who fhould either engrofs the government of the humbler and more numerous class incapable of governing themfelves, or at leaft fhould be placed as a rigid guard upon their exceffes, with powers adequate to their correction and reftraint."

caufe.

Ariftocratical eftimate of the human fpecies.

apiq

Anust

BOOK V. CHAP. X.

BOOK V. CHAP. X.

464

reftraint." The greater part of these reasonings will fall under our examination when we confider the difadvantages of democracy. So much as relates to the excellence of aristocracy it is neceffary at prefent to difcus.

The whole proceeds upon a fuppofition that, " if nobility should not, as its hereditary conflitution might feem to imply, be found originally fuperior to the ordinary rate of mortals, it is at leaft rendered eminently to by the power of education. Men, who grow up in unpolifhed ignorance and barbarifm, and are chilled with the icy touch of poverty, muft neceffarily be exposed to a thousand fources of corruption, and cannot have that delicate fenfe of rectitude and honour, which literature and manly refinement are found to beftow. It is under the aufpices of indulgence and eafe that civilifation is engendered. A nation must have furmounted the difadvantages of a first establishment. and have arrived at fome degree of leifure and prosperity, before the love of letters can take root among them. It is in individuals as in large bodies of men. A few exceptions will occur; but. bating thefe, it can hardly be expected that men, who are compelled in every day by laborious corporal efforts to provide for the neceffities of the day, fhould arrive at great expansion of mind and comprehensiveness of thinking."

Education of the great.

In certain parts of this argument there is confiderable truth. The real philosopher will be the last man to deny the power and importance of education. It is therefore neceffary, either BOOK V. that a fyftem should be discovered for fecuring leisure and profperity to every member of the community, or that a paramount influence and authority fhould be given to the liberal and the wife over the illiterate and ignorant. Now, fuppofing for the prefent that the former of these measures is impossible, it may yet be reafonable to enquire whether ariftocracy be the most judicious scheme for obtaining the latter. Some light may be collected on this fubject from what has already appeared refpecting education under the head of monarchy.

Education is much, but opulent education is of all its modes the least efficacious. The education of words is not to be despifed, but the education of things is on no account to be difpenfed with. The former is of admirable use in inforcing and developing the latter; but, when taken alone, it is pedantry and not learning, a body without a foul. Whatever may be the abstract perfection of which mind is capable, we feem at prefent frequently to need being excited, in the cafe of any uncommon effort, by motives that address themselves to the individual. But fo far as relates to thefe motives, the lower claffes of mankind, had they fufficient leifure, have greatly the advantage of the higher. The plebeian must be the maker of his own fortune; the lord finds his already made. The plebeian must expect to find himfelf neglected and defpifed in proportion as he is remifs

465

CHAP.

BOOK V. CHAP. X. in cultivating the objects of efteem; the lord will always be furrounded with fycophants and flaves. The lord therefore has no motive to industry and exertion; no stimulus to roufe him from the lethargic, "oblivious pool," out of which every finite intellect originally role. It must indeed be confessed, that truth does not need the alliance of circumstances, and that a man may arrive at the temple of fame by other pathways than those of milery and diffrefs. But the lord does not content himfelf with excluding the four of adverfity: he goes farther than this, and provides himfelf with fruitful fources of effeminacy and error. Man cannot offend with impunity against the great principle of universal good. He that accumulates to himfelf luxuries and titles and wealth to the injury of the whole, becomes degraded from the rank of man; and, however he may be admired by the multitude, is pitied by the wife and wearifome to himfelf. Hence it appears, that to elect men to the rank of nobility is to elect them to a post of moral danger and a means of depravity; but that to conftitute them hereditarily noble is to preclude them, bating a few extraordinary accidents, from all the caufes that generate ability and virtue.

Recapitulation. The reasonings we have here repeated upon the fubject of hereditary diffinction are fo obvious, that nothing can be a ftronger inftance of the power of prejudice inftilled in early youth, than the fact of their having been at any time called in queftion, question. If we can in this manner produce an hereditary BOOK v. legiflator, why not an hereditary moralift or an hereditary poet *? In reality an attempt in either of these kinds would be more rational and feafible than in the other. From birth as a phyfical caufe it fufficiently appears that little can be expected : and, for education, it is practicable in a certain degree, nor is it eafy to fet limits to that degree, to infuse poetical or philosophical emulation into a youthful mind; but wealth is the fatal blaft that deftroys the hopes of a future harveft. There was once indeed a gallant kind of virtue, that, by irrefiftibly feizing the fenfes, feemed to communicate extensively to young men of birth, the mixed and equivocal accomplifhments of chivalry; but, fince the fubjects of moral emulation have been turned from perfonal prowefs to the energies of intellect, and efpecially fince the field of that emulation has been more widely opened to the fpecies. the lifts have been almost uniformly occupied by those, whose narrow circumflances have goaded them to ambition, or whofe undebauched habits and fituation in life have refcued them from the poifon of flattery and effeminate indulgence.

466

* See Paine's Rights of Man.

302

CHAP.

CHAP.X.

[ 468 ]

CHAP. XI.

MORAL EFFECTS OF ARISTOCRACY.

IMPORTANCE OF PRACTICAL JUSTICE.—SPECIES OF IN-JUSTICE WHICH ARISTOCRACY CREATES.—ESTIMATE OF THE INJURY PRODUCED.—EXAMPLES.

BOOK V.

CHAP. XI.

Importance of practical iuffice.

HERE is one thing, more than all the reft, of importance to the well being of mankind, juffice. Can there be any thing problematical or paradoxical in this fundamental principle, that all injuffice is injury; and a thoufand times more injurious by its effects in perverting the underftanding and overturning our calculations of the future, than by the immediate calamity it may produce ?

All moral fcience may be reduced to this one head, calculation of the future. We cannot reafonably expect virtue from the multitude of mankind, if they be induced by the perverfenefs of the conductors of human affairs to believe that it is not their intereft to be virtuous. But this is not the point upon which the queftion turns. Virtue, is nothing elfe but the purfuit of general good. Juftice, is the ftandard which difcriminates the advantage of the many and of the few, of the whole and a part.

If

MORAL EFFECTS OF ARISTOCRACY.

If this first and most important of all subjects be involved in obfcurity, how fhall the well being of mankind be fubftantially promoted? The most benevolent of our species will be engaged in crufades of error; while the cooler and more phlegmatic fpectators, difcerning no evident clue that should guide them amidft the labyrinth, fit down in felfifh neutrality, and leave the complicated fcene to produce its own denouement.

It is true that human affairs can never be reduced to that flate of depravation as to reverfe the nature of juffice. Virtue will always be the intereft of the individual as well as of the public. Immediate virtue will always be beneficial to the prefent age, aswell as to their posterity. But, though the depravation cannot rife to this excefs, it will be abundantly fufficient to obfcure the understanding, and miflead the conduct. Human beings will never be fo virtuous as they might eafily be made, till juffice be the fpectacle perpetually prefented to their view, and injuffice bewondered at as a prodigy.

Of all the principles of juffice there is none fo material to the Species of inmoral rectitude of mankind as this, that no man can be aritheracy diffinguished but by his perfonal merit. Why not endeavour to reduce to practice fo fimple and fublime a leffon ? When a man has proved himfelf a benefactor to the public, when he has already by laudable perfeverance cultivated in himfelf talents. which need only encouragement and public favour to bring them 2.

juffice which

BOOK V. CHAP. XI.

MORAL EFFECTS

BOOK V. CHAP. XI. to maturity, let that man be honoured. In a flate of fociety where fictitious diffinctions are unknown, it is impoffible he fhould not be honoured. But that a man fhould be looked up to with fervility and awe, becaufe the king has beflowed on him a fpurious name, or decorated him with a ribband; that another fhould wallow in luxury, becaufe his anceftor three centuries ago bled in the quarrel of Lancafter or York; do we imagine that thefe iniquities can be practifed without injury ?

Effimate of the injury produced.

Let those who entertain this opinion converse a little with the lower orders of mankind. They will perceive that the unfortunate wretch, who with unremitted labour finds himself incapable adequately to feed and clothe his family, has a fense of injustice rankling at his heart.

> "One whom diftrefs has fpited with the world, Is he whom tempting fiends would pitch upon To do fuch deeds, as make the profperous men Lift up their hands and wonder who could do them*."

Such is the education of the human fpecies. Such is the fabric of political fociety.

But let us fuppofe that their fense of injuffice were less acute than it is here described, what favourable inference can be drawn from that? Is not the injuffice real? If the minds of men be fo * Tragedy of Douglas, Act iii.

withered

OF ARISTOCRACY.

withered and flupefied by the conftancy with which it is practifed, EOOK V. that they do not feel the rigour that grinds them into nothing, how does that improve the picture?

Let us for a moment give the reins no reflexion, and endeavour accurately to conceive the flate of mankind where juffice fhould form the public and general principle. In that cafe our moral feelings would affume a firm and wholfome tone, for they would not be perpetually counteracted by examples that weakened their energy and confounded their clearnefs. Men would be fearlefs, becaufe they would know that there were no legal fnares lying in wait for their lives. They would be courageous, becaufe no man would be preffed to the earth that another might enjoy immoderate luxury, becaufe every one would be fecure of the just reward of his industry and prize of his exertions. Jealoufy and hatred would ceafe, for they are the offspring of injuffice. Every man would fpeak truth with his neighbour, for there would be no temptation to falfhood and deceit. Mind would find its level, for there would be every thing to encourage and to animate. Science would be unfpeakably improved, for underftanding would convert into a real power, no longer an ignis fatuus, fhining and expiring by turns, and leading us into floughs of fophiftry, falfe fcience and fpecious miftake. All men would be difpofed to avow their difpofitions and actions: none would endeavour to fupprefs the just eulogium of his neighbour, for, fo long as there were tongues to record, the fuppreffion 5

MORAL EFFECTS

- 47<sup>2</sup> BOOK V.
- BOOK V. fuppreffion would be impoffible; none fear to detect the mif-CHAP. XI. conduct of his neighbour, for there would be no laws converting the fincere expreffion of our convictions into a libel.

Examples.

Let us fairly confider for a moment what is the amount of injuffice included in the inftitution of ariftocracy. I am born, suppose, a Polish prince with an income of £300,000 per annum. You are born a manorial ferf or a Creolian negro, by the law of your birth attached to the foil, and transferable by barter or otherwife to twenty fucceffive lords. In vain shall be your most generous efforts and your unwearied industry to free yourfelf from the intolerable yoke. Doomed by the law of your birth to wait at the gates of the palace you must never enter, to fleep under a ruined weather-beaten roof, while your mafter fleeps under canopies of ftate, to feed on putrefied offals while the world is ranfacked for delicacies for his table, to labour without moderation or limit under a parching fun while he bafks in perpetual floth, and to be rewarded at last with contempt, reprimand, ftripes and mutilation. In fact the cafe is worfe than this. I could endure all that injuffice or caprice could inflict, provided I poffeffed in the refource of a firm mind the power of looking down with pity on my tyrant, and of knowing that I had that within, that facred character of truth, virtue and fortitude, which all his injuffice could not reach. But a flave and a ferf are condemned to flupidity and vice, as well as to calamity.

OF ARISTOCRACY.

Is all this nothing? Is all this neceffary for the maintenance of BOOK V. civil order? Let it be recollected that for this diffinction there is not the smallest foundation in the nature of things, that, as we have already faid, there is no particular mould for the conftruction of lords, and that they are born neither better nor worfe than the pooreft of their dependents. It is this flructure of ariftocracy in all its fanctuaries and fragments against which reafon and philofophy have declared war. It is alike unjuft, whether we confider it in the cafts of India, the villainage of the feudal fyftem, or the defpotifm of the patricians of ancient Rome dragging their debtors into perfonal fervitude to expiate loans they could not repay. Mankind will never be in an eminent degree virtuous and happy, till each man shall posses that portion of diffinction and no more, to which he is entitled by his perfonal merits. The diffolution of ariftocracy is equally the interest of the oppressor and the oppressed. The one will be delivered from the liftlefinefs of tyranny, and the other from the brutalifing operation of fervitude. How long fhall we be told in vain, " that mediocrity of fortune is the true rampart of perfonal happiness?"

CHAP.

CHAP, XI

3 P

[ 474 ]

CHAP. XII.

OF TITLES.

THEIR ORIGIN AND HISTORY. — THEIR MISERABLE ABSUR-DITY. — TRUTH THE ONLY ADEQUATE REWARD OF MERIT.

BOOK V. CHAP.XII.

Their origin and hiftory.

HE cafe of mere titles is fo abfurd that it would deferve to be treated only with ridicule, were it not for the ferious mischiefs it imposes on mankind. The feudal system was a ferocious monfter devouring wherever it came all that the friend of humanity regards with attachment and love. The fystem of titles appears under a different form. The monfter is at length deftroyed, and they who followed in his train, and fattened upon the carcaffes of those he flew, have stuffed his skin, and by exhibiting it hope still to terrify mankind into patience and pufillanimity. The fyftem of the Northern invaders, however odious, efcaped the ridicule of the fystem of titles. When the feudal chieftains affumed a geographical appellation, it was from fome place really fubject to their authority; and there was no more abfurdity in the ftyle they affumed, than in our calling a man at prefent the governor of Tangiers or the governor of Gibraltar. The commander in chief or the fovereign did not then 5 then give an empty name; he conferred an earldom or a barony. a fubftantial tract of land, with houfes and men, and producing a real revenue. He now grants nothing but the privilege of calling yourfelf Tom who were beforetime called Will; and, to add to the abfurdity, your new appellation is borrowed from fome place perhaps you never faw, or fome country you never visited. The ftyle however is the fame; we are still earls and barons, governors of provinces and commanders of forts, and that with the fame evident propriety as the elector of Hanover and arch treasurer of the empire styles himself king of France.

OF TITLES.

Can there be any thing more ludicrous, than that the man, Their miferawho was yesterday Mr. St. John, the most eloquent speaker of the British house of commons, the most penetrating thinker. the umpire of maddening parties, the reftorer of peace to bleeding and exhaufted Europe, fhould be to-day lord Bolingbroke? In what is he become greater and more venerable than he was? In the pretended favour of a flupid and befotted woman, who always hated him, as fhe uniformly hated talents and virtue. though for her own interest she was obliged to endure him.

The friends of a man upon whom a title has recently been conferred, must either be wholly blinded by the partiality of friendship not to feel the ridicule of his fituation, or completely debafed by the parafitical fpirit of dependence not to betray their feelings. Every time they effay to fpeak, they are in danger of 3 P 2 blundering ble abfurdity.

BOOK V.

OF TITLES.

476 BOOK V.

blundering upon the inglorious appellations of Mr. and Sir*. Every time their tongue faulters with unconfirmed practice, the queftion rushes upon them with irrefiftible force, "What change has my old friend undergone; in what is he wifer or better, happier or more honourable?" The first week of a new title is a perpetual war of the feelings in every fpectator, the genuine dictates of common fenfe against the arbitrary institutions of fociety. To make the farce more perfect these titles are subject to perpetual fluctuations, and the man who is to-day earl of Kenfington, will to-morrow refign with unblufhing effrontery all appearance of character and honour to be called marquis of Kew. Hiftory labours under the Gothic and unintelligible burden; no mortal patience can connect the different flories of him who is to-day lord Kimbolton, and to-morrow earl of Manchefter; today earl of Mulgrave, and to-morrow marquis of Normanby and duke of Buckinghamshire.

Truth the only adequate reward of merit.

ъ

The abfurdity of these titles strikes us the more, because they are usually the reward of intrigue and corruption. But, were it otherwise, still they would be unworthy of the adherents of reason and justice. When we speak of Mr. St. John, as of the man, who by his eloquence swayed contending parties, who withdrew the conquering sword from suffering France, and gave:

* In reality these appellations are little less absurd than those by which they, are superfeded.

forty

forty years of peace and calm purfuit of the arts of life and wifdom to mankind, we fpeak of fomething eminently great. Can any title express these merits? Is not truth the confectated and fingle vehicle of juffice? Is not the plain and fimple truth worth all the cunning fubfitutions in the world? Could an oaken garland or a gilded coronet have added one atom to his real greatnefs? Garlands and coronets may be beftowed on the unworthy and profituted to the intriguing. Till mankind be fatisfied with the naked flatement of what they really perceive, till they confess virtue to be then most illustrious when she most difdains the aid of ornament, they will never arrive at that manly juffice of fentiment, at which they are defined one day to arrive. By this fcheme of naked truth, virtue will be every day a gainer; every fucceeding obferver will more fully do her juffice, while vice, deprived of that varnish with which she delighted to gloss her actions, of that gaudy exhibition which may be made alike by every pretender, will fpeedily fink into unheeded contempt.

477

BOOK V. CHAP. XII.

CHAP.

[ 478 ]

CHAP. XIII.

OF THE ARISTOCRATICAL CHARACTER.

INTOLERANCE OF ARISTOCRACY-DEPENDENT FOR ITS SUCCESS UPON THE IGNORANCE OF THE MULTITUDE .---PRECAUTIONS NECESSARY FOR ITS SUPPORT .--- DIFFER-ENT KINDS OF ARISTOCRACY .- ARISTOCRACY OF THE ROMANS: ITS VIRTUES-ITS VICES .- ARISTOCRATICAL DISTRIBUTION OF PROPERTY-REGULATIONS BY WHICH IT IS MAINTAINED-AVARICE IT ENGENDERS .--- ARGU-INNOVATION FROM THE PRESENT MENT AGAINST HAPPY ESTABLISHMENT OF AFFAIRS CONSIDERED. CONCLUSION.

BOOK V. CHAP. XIII. Intolerance of ariftocracy;

A RISTOCRACY in its proper fignification implies neither lefs nor more than a fcheme for rendering more permanent and vifible by the interference of political inftitution the inequality of mankind. Ariftocracy, like monarchy, is founded in falfhood, the offspring of art foreign to the real nature of things, and muft therefore, like monarchy, be fupported by artifice and falfe pretences. Its empire however is founded in principles more gloomy and unfocial than those of monarchy.

monarchy. The monarch often thinks it advifable to employ blandifhments and courtfhip with his barons and officers; but the lord deems it fufficient to rule with a rod of iron.

Both depend for their perpetuity upon ignorance. they, like Omar, deftroy the productions of profane reafoning, and perfuade mankind that the Alcoran contained every thing which it became them to fludy, they might then renew their leafe of empire. But here again arithocracy difplays its fuperior harfhnefs. Monarchy admits of a certain degree of monkifh learning among its followers. But ariftocracy holds a ftricter hand. Should the lower ranks of fociety once come to be generally taught to write and read, its power would be at an end. To make men ferfs and villains it is indifpenfibly neceffary to make them. brutes. This is a queftion which has long been canvaffed with great eagerness and avidity. The resolute advocates of the old fyftem have with no contemptible forefight oppofed this alarming innovation. In their well known obfervation, " that a fervant who has been taught to write and read ceafes to be any longer a paffive machine," is contained the embryo from which it would be eafy to explain the whole philosophy of human fociety.

And who is there that can reflect with patience upon the maneceffary for levolent contrivances of these infolent usurpers, contrivances the end of which is to keep the human species in a state of endless degradation ?

Could dependent for its fuccefs oning, upon the ignorance of the multi-

BOOK V,

479

BOOK V.

degradation? It is in the fubjects we are here examining that the celebrated maxim of "many made for one" is brought to the real teft. Those reasoners were no doubt wife in their generation, who two centuries ago conceived alarm at the blafphemous doctrine, " that government was inftituted for the benefit of the governed, and, if it proposed to itself any other object, was no better than an usurpation." It will perpetually be found that the men, who in every age have been the earlieft to give the alarm of innovation, and have been ridiculed on that account as bigoted and timid, were in reality perfons of more than common difcernment, who faw, though but imperfectly, in the rude principle the inferences to which it inevitably led. It is time that men of reflexion fhould choofe between the two alternatives : either to go back fairly and without referve to the primitive principles of tyranny; or, adopting any one of the axioms opposite to these. however neutral it may at first appear, not feebly and ignorantly to fhut their eyes upon its countlefs hoft of confequences.

Different kinds of ariflocracy. It is not neceffary to enter into a methodical difquifition of the different fpecies of ariftocracy, fince, if the above reafonings have any force, they are equally cogent againft them all. Ariftocracy may veft its prerogatives principally in the individual, as in Poland; or entirely refrict them to the nobles in their corporate capacity, as in Venice. The former will be more tumultuous and diforderly; the latter more jealous, intolerant and fevere. The magiftrates may either recruit their body by election among themfelves, themfelves, as in Holland; or by the choice of the people, as in ancient Rome.

480

The ariftocracy of ancient Rome was incomparably the most Arithocracy venerable and illustrious that ever existed upon the face of the mans: its earth. It may not therefore be improper to contemplate in them the degree of excellence to which ariftocracy may be raifed. They included in their inftitution fome of the benefits of democracy, as generally fpeaking no man became a member of the fenate, but in confequence of his being elected by the people to the fuperior magistracies. It was reafonable therefore to expect that the majority of the members would poffers fome degree of capacity. They were not like modern ariftocratical affemblies, in which, as primogeniture and not felection decides upon their prerogatives, we shall commonly feek in vain for capacity, except in a few of the lords of recent creation. As the plebeians were long reftrained from looking for candidates except among the patricians. that is, the posterity of fenators, it was reafonable to suppose that the most eminent talents would be confined to that order. A circumftance which contributed to this was the monopoly of liberal education and the cultivation of the mind, a monopoly which the art of printing has at length fully deftroyed. Accordingly all the great literary ornaments of Rome were either patricians, or of the equeftrian order, or their immediate depend-The plebeians, though in their corporate capacity they ents. poffeffed for fome centuries the virtues of fincerity, intrepidity, of the Rovirtues :.

3 Q

love

BOOK V.

CHAP. XIII

48 r

BOOK V. CHAP. XIII.

love of juffice and of the public, could never boaft of any of thole individual characters in their party that reflect luftre on mankind, except the two Gracchi: while the patricians told of Brutus, Valerius, Coriolanus, Cincinnatus, Camillus, Fabricius, Regulus, the Fabii, the Decii, the Scipios, Lucullus, Marcellus, Cato, Cicero, and innumerable others. With this retrofpect continually fuggefted to their minds it was almost venial for the stern heroes of Rome and the last illustrious martyrs of the republic to entertain aristocratical fentiments.

Let us however confider impartially this ariftocracy, fo incomits vices. parably fuperior to any other of ancient or modern times. Upon the first institution of the republic, the people possessed for a carcely any authority except in the election of magistrates, and even here their intrinsic importance was eluded by the mode of arranging the affembly, fo that the whole decifion vefted in the richer claffes No magistrates of any description were of the community. elected but from among the patricians. All caufes were judged by the patricians, and from their judgment there was no appeal. The patricians intermarried among themfelves, and thus formed a republic of narrow extent in the midft of the nominal one, which was held by them in a flate of abject fervitude. The idea which purified thefe ufurpations in the minds of the ufurpers, was, " that the vulgar are effentially coarfe, groveling and ignorant, and that there can be no fecurity for the empire of justice and confistency but in the decided afcendancy of the liberal." Thus, even while they they oppofed the effential interefts of mankind, they were animated with public spirit and an unbounded enthusiasm of vir-But it is not lefs true that they did oppofe the effential intue. terefts of mankind. What can be more extraordinary than the declamations of Appius Claudius in this ftyle, at once for the moral greatness of mind by which they were dictated, and the cruel intolerance they were intended to inforce? It is inexpreffibly painful to fee fo much virtue through fucceffive ages employed in counteracting the jufteft requifitions. The refult was, that the patricians, notwithstanding their immeasurable fuperiority in abilities, were obliged to yield one by one the exclufions to which they fo obftinately clung. In the interval they were led to have recourfe to the most odious methods of counteraction; and every man among them contended who fhould be loudeft in applause of the nefarious murder of the Gracchi. If the Romans were diffinguished for fo many virtues, conftituted as they were, what might they not have been but for the iniquity of ariftocratical ufurpation? The indelible blemifh of their hiftory, the love of conquest, originated in the fame caufe. Their wars, through every period of the republic, were nothing more than the contrivance of the patricians, to divert their countrymen from attending to the fentiments of unalterable truth, by leading them to fcenes of conquest and carnage. They understood the art, common to all governments, of confounding the understandings of the multitude, and perfuading them that the moft unprovoked

3 Q 2

BOOK V. CHAP. XIII.

BOOK V. provoked hoftilities were merely the dictates of neceffary defence.

Ariflocratical distribution of property :

The principle of ariftocracy is founded in the extreme inequality of conditions. No man can be an ufeful member of fociety, except fo far as his talents are employed in a manner conducive to the general advantage. In every fociety the produce, the means of contributing to the neceffities and conveniencies of its members, is of a certain amount. In every fociety the bulk at leaft of its members contribute by their perfonal exertions to the creation of this produce. What can be more reafonable and juft, than that the produce itfelf fhould with fome degree of equality be fhared among them ? What more injurious than the accumulating upon a few every means of fuperfluity and luxury, to the total destruction of the eafe, and plain, but plentiful, fubfistence of the many? It may be calculated that the king even of a limited monarchy, receives as the falary of his office, an income equivalent to the labour of fifty thousand men *. Let us fet out in our estimate from this point, and figure to ourselves the shares of his counfellors, his nobles, the wealthy commoners by whom the nobility will be emulated, their kindred and dependents. Is it any wonder that in fuch countries the lower orders of the community are exhausted by all the hardships of penury and immoderate fatigue? When we fee the wealth of a province fpread

* Taking the average price of labour at one fhilling per diem.

upon

upon the great man's table, can we be furprifed that his neighbours have not bread to fatiate the cravings of hunger?

Is this a flate of human beings that must be confidered as the last improvement of political wifdom? In fuch a state it is impoffible that eminent virtue should not be exceedingly rare. The higher and the lower claffes will be alike corrupted by their unnatural fituation. But to pass over the higher class for the prefent, what can be more evident than the tendency of want to contract the intellectual powers? The fituation which the wife man would defire for himfelf and for those in whose welfare he was interefted, would be a fituation of alternate labour and relaxation, labour that fhould not exhauft the frame, and relaxation that was in no danger to degenerate into indolence. Thus induftry and activity would be cherifhed, the frame preferved in a healthful tone, and the mind accustomed to meditation and reflection. But this would be the fituation of the whole human fpecies, if the fupply of our wants were equally diffributed. Can any fystem be more worthy of our difapprobation than that which converts nineteen-twentieths of them into beafts of burden, annihilates fo much thought, renders impoffible fo much virtue and extirpates fo much happinefs?

But it may be alledged, " that this argument is foreign to the regulations fubject of ariftocracy; the inequality of conditions being the in- maintained : evitable

by which it is

BOOK V. CHAP. XI

BOOK V. CHAP. XIII. evitable confequence of the inftitution of property." It is true that many diladvantages flow out of this inftitution in its fimpleft form; but these diladvantages, to whatever they may amount, are greatly aggravated by the operations of aristocracy. Aristocracy turns the ftream of property out of its natural channel, and forwards with the most affiduous care its accumulation in the hands of a very few perfons. The doctrines of primogeniture and entails, as well as the immense volumes of the laws of transfer and inheritance which have infested every part of Europe, were produced for this express purpose.

avarice it engenders.

At the fame time that it has endeavoured to render the acquifition of permanent property difficult, ariftocracy has greatly increafed the excitements to that acquifition. All men are accuftomed to conceive a thirft after diffinction and pre-eminence, but they do not all fix upon wealth as the object of this paffion, but varioufly upon fkill in any particular art, grace, learning, talents, wifdom and virtue. Nor does it appear that thefe latter objects are purfued by their votaries with lefs affiduity, than wealth is purfued by thofe who are anxious to acquire it. Wealth would be ftill lefs capable of being miftaken for the univerfal paffion, were it not rendered by political inftitution, more than by its natural influence, the road to honour and refpect.

There

There is no miftake more thoroughly to be deplored on this fubject, than that of perfons, fitting at their eafe and furrounded with all the conveniences of life, who are apt to exclaim, " We find things very well as they are;" and to inveigh bitterly againft all projects of reform, as " the romances of visionary men, and the declamations of those who are never to be fatisfied." Is it well, that fo large a part of the community should be kept in abject penury, rendered flupid with ignorance and difguftful with vice, perpetuated in nakednefs and hunger, goaded to the commiffion of crimes, and made victims to the mercilefs laws which the rich have inflituted to opprefs them? Is it fedition to enquire whether this flate of things may not be exchanged for a better? Or can there be any thing more difgraceful to ourfelves than to exclaim that " All is well," merely becaufe we are at our eafe, regardless of the milery, degradation and vice that may be occafioned in others?

There is one argument to which the advocates of monarchy Conclution. and ariftocracy always have recourfe when driven from every other pretence; the mifchievous nature of democracy. "However imperfect the two former of thefe inftitutions may be in themfelves, they are found neceffary," we are told, " as accommodations to the imperfection of human nature." It is for the reader who has confidered the arguments of the preceding chapters to decide, how far it is probable that circumflances can 6 occur,

487

Argument againft innovation from the prefent happy eftablifthment of affairs confidered.

T ° °

BOOK V. CHAP. XIII,

v. occur, which fhould make it our duty to fubmit to thefe complicated evils. Meanwhile let us proceed to examine that democracy of which fo alarming a picture has uniformly been exhibited,

CHAP.

[ 480 ]

CHAP. XIV.

GENERAL FEATURES OF DEMOCRACY.

DEFINITION .--- SUPPOSED EVILS OF THIS FORM OF GO-VERNMENT --- ASCENDANCY OF THE IGNORANT --- OF THE CRAFTY-INCONSTANCY - RASH CONFIDENCE -· GROUNDLESS SUSPICION. --- MERITS AND DEFECTS OF DEMOCRACY COMPARED. - ITS MORAL TENDENCY. -TENDENCY OF TRUTH, --- REPRESENTATION.

EMOCRACY is a fystem of government according to which every member of fociety is confidered as a man and nothing more. So far as politive regulation is concerned, if indeed that can with any propriety be termed regulation which is the mere recognition of the fimplest of all principles, every man is regarded as equal. Talents and wealth, wherever they exift, will not fail to obtain a certain degree of influence, without requiring any politive inftitution of fociety to fecond their operation.

But there are certain difadvantages that may feem the necef- Suppofed fary refult of democratical equality. In political fociety it is cracy: reafonable to fuppofe that the wife will be outnumbered by the evils of demounwife.

BOOK V.

Definition.

GENERAL FEATURES

BOOK V. CHAP. XIV. afcendancy of the ignorant :

of the crafty :

unwife, and it will be inferred "that the welfare of the wholewill therefore be at the mercy of ignorance and folly." It is true that the ignorant will generally be fufficiently willing to be guided by the judicious, "but their very ignorance will incapacitate them from difcerning the merit of their guides. The turbulent and crafty demagogue will often poffefs greater advantages for inveigling their judgment, than the man who with purer intentions may poffes a less brilliant talent. Add to this, that the demagogue has a never failing refource in the ruling imperfection of human nature, that of preferring the fpecious prefent to the fubftantial future. This is what is ufually termed, playing upon the paffions of mankind. Political truth has hithertoproved an enigma, that all the wit of man has been infufficient to folve. Is it to be supposed that the uninstructed multitude should always be able to refift the artful fophiftry and captivating eloquence that will be employed to darken it ? Will it not often happen that the fchemes propofed by the ambitious diffurber will posses a meretricious attraction, which the fevere and fober project of the difcerning flatefinan shall be unable to compensate?

inconftancy: "One of the moft fruitful fources of human happinefs is to be found in the fleady and uniform operation of certain fixed principles. But it is the characteriftic of a democracy to be wavering and inconftant. The philofopher only, who has deeply meditated his principles, is inflexible in his adherence to them. The mafs of mankind, as they have never arranged their reflections.

in a

490

OF DEMOCRACY.

reflections into fystem, are at the mercy of every momentary BOOK V. impulfe, and liable to change with every wind. But this inconflancy is directly the reverfe of every idea of political juffice.

"Nor is this all. Democracy is a monftrous and unwieldy rafh confiveffel launched upon the fea of human paffions without ballaft. Liberty in this unlimited form is in danger to be loft almoft as foon as it is obtained. The ambitious man finds nothing in this fcheme of human affairs to fet bounds to his defires. He has only to dazzle and deceive the multitude in order to rife to abfolute power.

"A farther ill confequence flows out of this circumftance. groundlefs The multitude, confcious of their weaknefs in this refpect, will, in proportion to their love of liberty and equality, be perpetually fufpicious and uneafy. Has any man difplayed uncommon virtues or rendered eminent fervices to his country ? He will prefently be charged with fecretly aiming at the tyranny. Various circumftances will come in aid of this accufation, the general love of novelty, cnvy of fuperior merit, and the incapacity of the multitude to underftand the motives and character of those who fo far excel them. Like the Athenian, they will be tired of hearing Ariftides conftantly called the Juft. Thus will merit be too frequently the victim of ignorance and envy. Thus will all that is liberal and refined, whatever the human mind in its higheft ftate of improvement is able to conceive, be 3 R 2 often dence :

CHAP, XIV

fufpicion.

GENERAL FEATURES

BOOK V. CHAP. XIV.

$1

often overpowered by the turbulence of unbridled paffion and the rude dictates of favage folly."

If this picture muft inevitably be realifed wherever democratical principles are eftablished, the flate of human nature would be peculiarly unfortunate. No form of government can be devifed which does not partake of monarchy, ariftocracy or democracy. We have taken a copious furvey of the two former, and it would feem impoffible that greater or more inveterate mifchiefs can be inflicted on mankind, than those which are inflicted by them. No portrait of injustice, degradation and vice can be exhibited, that can furpass the fair and inevitable inferences from the principle upon which they are built. If then democracy could by any arguments be brought down to a level with fuch monstrous inflitutions as these, in which there is neither integrity nor reason, our prospects of the future happiness of mankind would indeed be deplorable.

Merits and defects of democracy compared.] But this is impofible. Supposing that we should even be obliged to take democracy with all the difadvantages that were ever annexed to it, and that no remedy could be difcovered for any of its defects, it would be still greatly preferable to the exclusive fystem of other forms. Let us take Athens with all its turbulence and instability; with the popular and temperate usurpations of Pisisstratus and Pericles; with their monstrous oftracism, by which with undifguised injustice they were accustomed periodically cally to banifh fome eminent citizen without the imputation of a BOOK V. crime : with the imprifonment of Miltiades, the exile of Ariftides and the murder of Phocion :- with all thefe errors on its head. it is incontrovertible that Athens exhibited a more illustrious and enviable fpectacle than all the monarchies and ariftocracies that ever exifted. Who would reject the gallant love of virtue and independence, becaufe it was accompanied with fome irregularities? Who would pafs an unreferved condemnation upon their penetrating mind, their quick difcernment and their ardent feeling, becaufe they were fubject occasionally to be intemperate and impetuous? Shall we compare a people of fuch incredible achievements, fuch exquisite refinement, gay without infenfibility and fplendid without intemperance, in the midft of whom grew up the greatest poets, the noblest artists, the most finished orators and political writers, and the most difinterested philosophers the world ever faw,-fhall we compare this chosen feat of patriotifm, independence and generous virtue, with the torpid and felfish realms of monarchy and aristocracy? All is not happinefs that looks tranquillity. Better were a portion of turbulence and fluctuation, than that unwholfome calm which is a ftranger to virtue.

492

In the effimate that is ufually made of democracy, one of the Its moral tens moft flagrant fources of error lies in our taking mankind fuch as monarchy and ariftocracy have made them, and from thence judging how fit they are to legislate for themfelves. Monarchy and : dency.

,

CHAP. XIV.

GENERAL FEATURES

BOOK V. CHAP. XIV.

and aristocracy would be no evils, if their tendency were not to undermine the virtues and the underftandings of their fubjects. The thing most necessary is to remove all those restraints which hold mind back from its natural flight. Implicit faith, blind fubmiffion to authority, timid fear, a diftruft of our powers, an inattention to our own importance and the good purpofes we are able to effect, these are the chief obftacles to human improve-Democracy reftores to man a confcioufnefs of his value, ment. teaches him by the removal of authority and oppreffion to liften only to the dictates of reafon, gives him confidence to treat all other men as his fellow beings, and induces him to regard them no longer as enemies against whom to be upon his guard, but as brethren whom it becomes him to affift. The citizen of a democratical ftate, when he looks upon the miferable oppreffion and injuffice that prevail in the countries around him, cannot but entertain an inexpreffible effeem for the advantages he enjoys. and the most unalterable determination at all hazards to preferve The influence of democracy upon the fentiments of its them. members is altogether of the negative fort, but its confequences are ineftimable. Nothing can be more unreafonable than to argue from men as we now find them, to men as they may hereafter be made. Strict and accurate reafoning, inftead of fuffering us to be furprifed that Athens did fo much, would at firft induce us to wonder that the retained fo many imperfections.

Tendency of The road to the improvement of mankind is in the utmoft truth. degree degree fimple, to fpeak and act the truth. If the Athenians had had more of this, it is impoffible they fhould have been fo flagrantly erroneous. To tell the truth in all cafes without referve, to administer justice without partiality, are principles which, when once rigoroufly adopted, are of all others the moft prolific. They enlighten the underftanding, give energy to the judgment, and ftrip mifreprefentation of its fpecioufnels and plaufibility. In Athens men fuffered themfelves to be dazzled by fplendour and fhow. If the error in their conflitution which led to this defect can be discovered, if a form of political fociety can be devifed in which men fhall be accuftomed to judge ftrictly and foberly, and habitually exercifed to the plainnefs and fimplicity of truth, democracy would in that fociety ceafe from the turbulence, inftability, fickleness and violence that have too often characterifed it. Nothing can be more certain than the omnipotence of truth, or, in other words, than the connexionbetween the judgment and the outward behaviour. If fcience be capable of perpetual improvement, men will also be capable of perpetually advancing in practical wifdom and juffice. Once eftablish the perfectibility of man, and it will inevitably follow that we are advancing to a flate, in which truth will be too well known to be eafily miftaken, and juffice too habitually practifed to be voluntarily counteracted. Nor shall we fee reason to think upon fevere reflection, that this flate is fo diffant as we might at furft be inclined to imagine. Error is principally indebted for its permanence to focial inftitution. Did we leave individuals to the :

BOOK V. CHAP. XIV.

GENERAL FEATURES

BOOK V. CHAP. XIV.

496

the progress of their own minds, without endeavouring to regulate them by any species of public foundation, mankind would in no very long period convert to the obedience of truth. The contest between truth and falshood is of itself too unequal, for the former to stand in need of support from any political ally. The more it be discovered, especially that part of it which relates to man in fociety, the more simple and self evident will it appear; and it will be found impossible any otherwise to account for its having been so long concealed, than from the pernicious influence of positive institution.

Reprefentation. There is another obvious confideration that has frequently been alledged to account for the imperfection of ancient democracies, which is worthy of our attention, though it be not fo important as the argument which has juft been ftated. The ancients were unaccuftomed to the idea of deputed, or reprefentative affemblies; and it is reafonable to fuppofe that affairs might often be tranfacted with the utmoft order in fuch affemblies, which might be productive of much tumult and confufion, if fubmitted to the perfonal difcuffion of the citizens at large*. By this happy expedient we fecure many of the pretended benefits of ariftocracy, as well as the real benefits of democracy. The difcuffion of national affairs is brought before perfons of

* The general grounds of this inflitution have been flated, Book III, Chap. IV. The exceptions which limit its value, will be feen in the twenty-third chapter of the prefent book.

fuperior

OF DEMOCRACY.

fuperior education and wifdom : we may conceive of them, not only as the appointed medium of the fentiments of their conftituents, but as authorifed upon certain occafions to act on their part, in the fame manner as an unlearned parent delegates his authority over his child to a preceptor of greater accomplithments than himfelf. This idea within proper limits might be entitled to our approbation, provided the elector had the wifdom not to relax in the exercise of his own understanding in all his political concerns, exerted his cenforial power over his reprefentative, and were accustomed, if the reprefentative were unable after the fullest explanation to bring him over to his opinion, to transfer his deputation to another.

The true value of the fyftem of reprefentation is as follows. It is not reafonable to doubt that mankind, whether acting by themfelves or their reprefentatives, might in no long time be enabled to contemplate the fubjects offered to their examination with calmnefs and true difcernment, provided no pofitive obftacles were thrown in their way by the errors and imperfection of their political inftitutions. This is the principle in which the found political philofopher will reft with the most perfect fatisfaction. But, fhould it ultimately appear that reprefentation, and not the intervention of popular affemblies, is the mode which reafon preferibes, then an error in this preliminary queftion, will of courfe infer errors in the practice which is built upon it. We cannot make one falfe ftep, without involving

3 S

BOOK V.

GENERAL FEATURES OF DEMOCRACY.

BOOK V. CHAP. XIV.

498

ourfelves in a feries of miftakes and ill confequences that muft be expected to grow out of it.

Such are the general features of democratical government: but this is a fubject of too much importance to be difmiffed without the fulleft examination of every thing that may enable us to decide upon its merits. We will proceed to confider the farther objections that have been alledged againft it.

499

CHAP. XV.

OF POLITICAL IMPOSTURE.

IMPORTANCE OF THIS TOPIC .--- EXAMPLE IN THE DOCTRINE OF ETERNAL PUNISHMENT-ITS INUTILITY ARGUED ----EXAMPLE: THE RELIGIOUS SANCTION OF A LEGISLATIVE SYSTEM .- THIS IDEA IS, I. IN STRICT CONSTRUCTION IMPRACTICABLE ---- 2. INJURIOUS. ---- THIRD EXAMPLE: PRINCIPLE OF POLITICAL ORDER.---VICE HAS NO ESSEN-TIAL ADVANTAGE OVER VIRTUE. --- IMPOSTURE UNNE-CESSARY TO THE CAUSE OF JUSTICE-NOT ADAPTED TO THE NATURE OF MAN.

LL the arguments that have been employed to prove the I infufficiency of democracy grow out of this one root, the fuppofed neceffity of deception and prejudice for reflrain- of this topic. ing the turbulence of human paffions. Without the affumption of this principle the argument could not be fuftained for a moment. The direct and decifive anfwer would be, "Are kings and lords intrinfically wifer and better than their humbler neighbours? Can there be any folid ground of diffinction except what is founded in perfonal merit? Are not men, really and 3 S 2 ftrialy

,

Importance

OF POLITICAL IMPOSTURE.

BOOK V. CHAP. XV.

ftrictly confidered, equal, except fo far as what is perfonal and inalienable makes them to differ?" To thefe queftions there can be but one reply, "Such is the order of reafon and abfolute truth, but artificial diffinctions are neceffary for the happinefs of mankind. Without deception and prejudice the turbulence of human paffions cannot be reftrained." Let us then examine the merits of this theory; and thefe will beft be illuftrated by an inftance.

Example in the doctrine of eternal punifhment : It has been held by fome divines and fome politicians, that the doctrine which teaches that men will be eternally tormented in another world for their errors and mifconduct in this, is " in its own nature unreafonable and abfurd, but that it is neverthelefs neceffary, to keep mankind in awe. Do we not fee," fay they, " that notwithftanding this terrible denunciation the world is overrun with vice? What then would be the cafe, if the irregular paffions of mankind were fet free from their prefent reftraint, and they had not the fear of this retribution before their eyes?"

its inutility argued from hiltory :

This argument feems to be founded in a fingular inattention to the dictates of hiftory and experience, as well as to those of reason. The ancient Greeks and Romans had nothing of this dreadful apparatus of fire and brimftone, and a torment " the fmoke of which ascends for ever and ever." Their religion was less personal than political. They confided in the Gods as protectors of the state, and this inspired them with invincible courage.

POLITICAL IMPOSTURE. OF

In periods of public calamity they found a ready confolarage. tion in expiatory facrifices to appeafe the anger of the Gods. The attention of these beings was conceived to be principally directed to the ceremonial of religion, and very little to the moral excellencies and defects of their votaries, which were fuppofed to be fufficiently provided for by the inevitable tendency of moral excellence or defect to increase or diminish individual happines. If their fyftems included the doctrine of a future exiftence, little attention was paid by them to the connecting the moral deferts of individuals in this life with their comparative fituation in another. The fame defect ran through the fyftems of the Perfians, the Egyptians, the Celts, the Phenicians, the Jews, and indeed every fystem which has not been in fome manner or other the offspring of the Christian. If we were to form our judgment of these nations by the above argument, we should expect to find every individual among them cutting his neighbour's throat, and hackneyed in the commission of every enormity without measure and without remorfe. But they were in reality as fusceptible of the regulations of government and the order of fociety, as those whose imaginations have been most artfully terrified by the threats of future retribution, and fome of them were much more generous, determined and attached to the public weal.

Nothing can be more contrary to a just observation of the from the nanature of the human mind, than to fuppofe that thefe fpeculative ture of mind.

tenets

BOOK V. CHAP. XV.

OF POLITICAL IMPOSTURE.

BOOK V. CHAP. XV. tenets have much influence in making mankind more virtuous than they would otherwife be found. Human beings are placed in the midft of a fystem of things, all the parts of which are ftrictly connected with each other, and exhibit a fympathy and unifon by means of which the whole is rendered intelligible and as it were palpable to the mind. The refpect I shall obtain and the happiness I shall enjoy for the remainder of my life are topics of which my mind has a complete comprehension. I underftand the value of plenty, liberty and truth to myfelf and my I perceive that thefe things and a certain conduct fellow men. intending them are connected, in the visible fystem of the world, and not by the fupernatural interpolition of an invilible director. But all that can be told me of a future world, a world of fpirits or of glorified bodies, where the employments are fpiritual and the first cause is to be rendered a subject of immediate perception, or of a fcene of retribution, where the mind, doomed to everlafting inactivity, fhall be wholly a prey to the upbraidings of remorfe and the farcaims of devils, is fo foreign to the fyftem of things with which I am acquainted, that my mind in vain endeavours to believe or to understand it. If doctrines like these occupy the habitual reflections of any, it is not of the lawlefs, the violent and ungovernable, but of the fober and confcientious. perfuading them paffively to fubmit to defpotifin and injuffice, that they may receive the recompense of their patience hereafter. This objection is equally applicable to every fpecies of decep-Fables may amufe the imagination; but can never ftand tion. in in the place of reafon and judgment as the principles of human conduct.-Let us proceed to a fecond inftance.

POLITICAL IMPOSTURE. OF

It is affirmed by Rouffeau in his treatife of the Social Contract, Second ex-" that no legiflator could ever eftablish a grand political fystem religious without having recourse to religious imposture. To render a legislative people who are yet to receive the impreffions of political wifdom fusceptible of the evidence of that wifdom, would be to convert the effect of civilisation into the caufe. The legislator ought not to employ force and cannot employ reafoning; he is therefore obliged to have recourse to authority of a different fort, which may draw without compulsion, and perfuade without conviction*."

Thefe

* " Pour qu'un peuple naissant put gouter les saines maximes de la politique & suivre les regles fondamentales de la raison de l'état, il faudroit que l'effet put devenir la caufe, que l'esprit focial, qui doit être l'ouvrage de l'institution, présidât à l'institution même, & que les hommes fussent avant les lois ce qu'ils doivent devenir par elles. Ainfi donc le l'égislateur ne pouvant employer ni la force ni le raisonnement ; c'est une nécessité qu'il recoure à une autorité d'un autre ordre, qui puisse entrainer sans violence. & perfuader fans convaincre." Du Contrat Social, Liv. II. Chap. VII.

Having frequently quoted Rouffeau in the courfe of this work, it may be allowable to fay one word of his general merits as a moral and political writer. He has been fubjected to perpetual ridicule for the extravagance of the propolition with which he began his literary career; that the favage flate was the genuine and proper condition of man. It was however by a very flight miftake that he miffed the opposite opinion which it is the business of the prefent volume to eftabhfh.

BOOK V. CHAP. XV.

ample: the fanction of a fyitem.

OF POLITICAL IMPOSTURE.

BOOK V. CHAP. XV.

504

These are the dreams of a fertile conception, bufy in the erection of imaginary fystems. To a rational mind that project would feem to promise little fubstantial benefit, which fet out from fo erroneous a principle. To terrify men into the reception of a fystem the reasonableness of which they were unable to perceive, is furely a very indirect method of rendering them fober, judicious, fearless and happy.

This idea is, 1. in ftrict conftruction impracticable: In reality no grand political fyftem ever was introduced in the blifh. It is fufficiently obfervable that, where he defcribes the enthufiaftic influx of truth that firft made him a moral and political writer (in his fecond letter to Malefherbes), he does not fo much as mention his fundamental error, but only the juft principles which led him into it. He was the firft to teach that the imperfections of government were the only permanent fource of the vices of mankind; and this principle was adopted from him by Helvetius and others. But he faw farther than this, that government, however reformed, was little capable of affording folid benefit to mankind, which they did not. This principle has fince (probably without any affiftance from the writings of Rouffeau) been expressed with great perfpicuity and energy, but not developed, by Mr. Thomas Paine in the firft page of his Common Senfe.

Rouffeau, notwithftanding his great genius, was full of weaknefs and prejudice. His Emile is upon the whole to be regarded as the principal refervoir of philofophical truth as yet exifting in the world, but with a perpetual mixture of abfurdity and miftake. In his writings exprefsly political, Du Contrat Social and Confidérations fur la Pologne, the unrivalled fuperiority of his genius appears to defert him. To his merits as a reafoner we fhould not forget to add, that the term eloquence is perhaps more precifely defcriptive of his mode of composition, than of that of any other writer that ever existed.

DF POLITICAL IMPOSTURE.

manner Rouffeau describes. Lycurgus, as he observes, obtained the fanction of the oracle at Delphi to the conflitution he had eftablished. But was it by an appeal to Apollo that he perfuaded the Spartans to renounce the use of money, to confent to an equal division of land, and to adopt various other regulations the most contrary to their preconceived prejudices? No: it was by an appeal to their underftandings, in the midft of long debate and perpetual counteraction, and through the inflexibility of his courage and refolution, that he at last attained his purpose. Lycurgus thought proper, after the whole was concluded, to obtain the fanction of the oracle, conceiving that it became him to neglect no method of fubftantiating the benefit he had conferred on his It is indeed hardly poffible to perfuade a fociety countrymen. of men to adopt any fyftem without convincing them that it is their wildom to adopt it. It is difficult to conceive of a fociety of fuch miferable dupes as to receive a code, without any imagination that it is reafonable or wife or juft, but upon this fingle recommendation that it is delivered to them from the Gods. The only reafonable, and infinitely the most efficacious method of changing the inflitutions of any people, is by creating in them a general opinion of their erroneoufnefs and infufficiency.

But, if it be indeed impracticable to perfuade men into the 2. injurious. adoption of any fyftem, without employing as our principal argument the intrinsic rectitude of that fystem, what is the argument which he would defire to ufe, who had most at heart the welfare

3 T

505

book v. CHAP. XV.

OF POLITICAL IMPOSTURE.

BOOK V. CHAP. XV. welfare and improvement of the perfons concerned? Would he begin by teaching them to reafon well, or to reafon ill ? by unnerving their mind with prejudice, or new ftringing it with truth? How many arts, and how noxious to those towards whom we employ them, are neceffary, if we would fuccefsfully deceive? We must not only leave their reason in indolence at first, but endeavour to fuperfede its exertion in any future inftance. If men be for the prefent kept right by prejudice, what will become of them hereafter, if by any future penetration or any accidental difcovery this prejudice shall be annihilated ?' Detection is not always the fruit of fyftematical improvement, but may be effected by fome folitary exertion of the faculty or fome luminous and irrefiftible argument, while every thing elfe remains as If we would first deceive, and then maintain our decepit was. tion unimpaired, we shall need penal statutes, and licensers of the prefs, and hired ministers of falshood and imposture. Admirable modes thefe for the propagation of wifdom and virtue !

Third example : principle of political order. There is another cafe fimilar to that flated by Rouffeau, upon which much flrefs has been laid by political writers. "Obedience," fay they, " muft either be courted or compelled. We muft either make a judicious ufe of the prejudices and the ignorance of mankind, or be contented to have no hold upon them but their fears, and maintain focial order entirely by the feverity of punifhment. To difpenfe us from this painful neceffity, authority ought carefully to be invefted with a fort of magic perfuafion.

fuafion. Citizens should ferve their country, not with a frigid fubmiffion that fcrupuloufly weighs its duties, but with an enthusias that places its honour in its loyalty. For this reason our governors and fuperiors muft not be fpoken of with levity. They must be confidered, independently of their individual character, as deriving a facredness from their office. They must be accompanied with fplendour and veneration. Advantage muft be taken of the imperfection of mankind. We ought to gain over their judgments through the medium of their fenfes, and not leave the conclusions to be drawn, to the uncertain process of immature reafon *."

This is still the fame argument under another form. It takes Vice has no for granted that reafon is inadequate to teach us our duty; and vantage over of confequence recommends an equivocal engine, which may with equal eafe be employed in the fervice of juffice and injuftice, but would furely appear fomewhat more in its place in the fervice of the latter. It is injuffice that flands moft in need of fuperflition and myftery, and will moft frequently be a gainer by the imposition. This hypothesis proceeds upon an affumption. which young men fometimes impute to their parents and preceptors. It fays, " Mankind must be kept in ignorance : if they know vice, they will love it too well; if they perceive the charms

* This argument is the great common place of Mr. Burke's Reflections on the Revolution in France, of feveral fucceflive productions of Mr. Necker, and of a multitude of other works upon the fubject of government.

3 T 2

of

BOOK V. CHAP. XV.

effential ad-

virtue.

OF POLITICAL IMPOSTURE.

BOOK V. CHAP. XV. of error, they will never return to the fimplicity of truth." And, ftrange as it may appear, this barefaced and unplaufible argument has been the foundation of a very popular and generally received hypothefis. It has taught politicians to believe that a people once funk into decrepitude, as it has been termed, could never afterwards be endued with purity and vigour *.

Imposture unneceffary to the caufe of justice. Is it certain that there is no alternative between deceit and unrelenting feverity? Does our duty contain no inherent recommendations? If it be not our own intereft that we fhould be temperate and virtuous, whofe intereft is it? Political inftitution, as has abundantly appeared in the courfe of this work, and will ftill farther appear as we go forward, has been too frequently the parent of temptations to error and vice of a thoufand different denominations. It would be well, if legiflators, inftead of contriving farther deceptions and enchantments to retain us in our duty, would remove the impoftures which at prefent corrupt our hearts and engender at once artificial wants and real diffrefs. There would be lefs need, under the fyftem of plain, unornamented truth, than under theirs, that " every vifto fhould be terminated with the gallows  $\dagger$ ."

Why deceive me? It is either my wifdom to do the thing you require of me, or it is not. The reafons for doing it are either fufficient or infufficient. If fufficient, why fhould not they be the * Book I, Chap. VIII. + Burke's Reflections.

3 machine

machine to govern my understanding? Shall I most improve while I am governed by falle reafons, by imposture and artifice, which, were I a little wifer, I fhould know were of no value in whatever caufe they may be employed; or, while my underftanding grows every day founder and ftronger by perpetual communication with truth ? If the reafons for what you demand of me be infufficient, why fhould I comply? It is ftrongly to be fuspected that that regulation, which dares not reft upon its own reafonablenefs, conduces to the benefit of a few at the expence of the many. Impofture was furely invented by him, who thought more of fecuring dignity to himfelf, than of prevailing on mankind to confent to their own welfare. That which you require of me is wife, no farther than it is reafonable. Why endeavour to perfuade me that it is more wife, more effential than it really is, or that it is wife for any other reafon than the true? Why divide men into two claffes, one of which is to think and reafon for the whole, and the other to take the conclusions of their fuperiors on truft? This diffinction is not founded in the nature of things; there is no fuch inherent difference between man and man as it thinks proper to fuppofe. The reafons that fhould convince us that virtue is better than vice are neither complicated nor abstrufe; and the lefs they be tampered with by the injudicious interference of political inflitution, the more will they come home to the underftanding and approve themfelves to the judgment of every man.

BOOK V. CHAP. XV.

Nor

OF POLITICAL IMPOSTURE.

BOOK V. CHAP. XV. Not adapted to the nature of man.

Nor is the diffinction lefs injurious, than it is unfounded. The two claffes which it creates, must be more and lefs than It is too much to expect of the former, while we confign man. to them an unnatural monopoly, that they fhould rigidly confult for the good of the whole. It is an iniquitous requifition upon the latter, that they fhould never employ their understandings, never penetrate into the effences of things, but always reft in a deceitful appearance. It is iniquitous, that we fhould feek to withhold from them the principles of fimple truth, and exert ourfelves to keep alive their fond and infantine miltakes. The time must probably come when the deceit shall vanish; and then the impoftures of monarchy and ariftocracy will no longer be able to maintain their ground. The change will at that time be moft aufpicious, if we honeftly inculcate the truth now, fecure that men's minds will grow ftrong enough to endure the practice, in proportion as their underftanding of the theory excites them to demand it.

CHAP.

[ 511 ]

CHAP. XVI.

OF THE CAUSES OF WAR:

OFFENSIVE WAR CONTRARY TO THE NATURE OF DEMO-CRACY.-DEFENSIVE WAR EXCEEDINGLY RARE.---ERRO-NEOUSNESS OF THE IDEAS COMMONLY ANNEXED TO THE PHRASE, OUR COUNTRY .- NATURE OF WAR DELINE-ATED .--- INSUFFICIENT CAUSES OF WAR--- THE ACQUIR-ING A HEALTHFUL AND VIGOROUS TONE TO THE PUB-LIC MIND-THE PUTTING A TERMINATION UPON PRI-VATE INSULTS-THE MENACES OR PREPARATIONS OF OUR NEIGHBOURS-THE DANGEROUS CONSEQUENCES OF CONCESSION .- TWO LEGITIMATE CAUSES OF WAR.

XCLUSIVELY of those objections which have been BOOK v. urged against the democratical fystem as it relates to the internal management of affairs, there are others upon which confiderable ftrefs has been laid in relation to the transaction of a ftate with foreign powers, to war and peace, to treaties of alliance and commerce.

CHAP, XVI.

There is indeed an eminent difference with respect to these Offensive war between the democratical fystem and all others. It is perhaps the nature of contrary to democracy.

impoffible

BOOK V. CHAP. XVI.

impoffible to fhew that a fingle war ever did or could have taken place in the hiftory of mankind, that did not in fome way originate with those two great political monopolies, monarchy and ariftocracy. This might have formed an additional article in the catalogue of evils to which they have given birth, little inferior to any of those we have enumerated. But nothing could be more fuperfluous than to feek to overcharge a fubject the evidence of which is irresiftible.

What could be the fource of mifunderstanding between states, where no man or body of men found encouragement to the accumulation of privileges to himfelf at the expence of the reft? A people among whom equality reigned, would poffers every thing they wanted, where they poffeffed the means of fubfiftence. Why fhould they purfue additional wealth or territory? Thefe would lofe their value the moment they became the property of all. No man can cultivate more than a certain portion of land. Money is reprefentative, and not real wealth. If every man in the fociety poffeffed a double portion of money, bread and every other commodity would fell at double their prefent price, and the relative fituation of each individual would be just what it had been before. War and conquest cannot be beneficial to the Their tendency is to elevate a few at the expence community. of the reft, and confequently they will never be undertaken but where the many are the inftruments of the few. But this cannot happen in a democracy, till the democracy shall become fuch fuch only in name. If expedients can be devifed for maintaining this fpecies of government in its purity, or if there be any thing in the nature of wildom and intellectual improvement which has a tendency daily to make truth prevail more over falfhood, the principle of offenfive war will be extirpated. But this principle enters into the very effence of monarchy and ariftocracy.

Meanwhile, though the principle of offenfive war be in- Defenfive war compatible with the genius of democracy, a democratical flate may rare. be placed in the neighbourhood of flates whofe government is lefs equal, and therefore it will be proper to enquire into the fuppofed difadvantages which the democratical flate may fuftain in the conteft. The only fpecies of war in which it can confiftently be engaged, will be that, the object of which is to repel wanton invafion. Such invafions will be little likely frequently to occur. For what purpofe flould a corrupt flate attack a country, which has no feature in common with itfelf upon which to build a mifunderftanding, and which prefents in the very nature of its government a pledge of its own inoffenfiveness and neutrality? Add to which, it will prefently appear that this flate, which yields the feweft incitements to provoke an attack, will prove a very impracticable adverfary to those by whom an attack fhall be commenced.

One of the moft effential principles of political justice is diame- Erroneoufnefs of the 2 U ~ trically

513

BOOK V. CHAP. YVI.

exceedingly

CHAP. XVI. ideas ccmmonly m.nexed to the phrafe, our country.

BOOK V.

514

trically the reverfe of that which impoftors and patriots have too frequently agreed to recommend. Their perpetual exhortation has been, "Love your country. Sink the perfonal exiftence of individuals in the exiftence of the community. Make little account of the particular men of whom the fociety confifts, but aim at the general wealth, profperity and glory. Furify your mind from the grofs ideas of fenfe, and elevate it to the fingle contemplation of that abftract individual of which particular men are fo many detached members, valuable only for the place they fill *."

The leffons of reafon on this head are precifely oppofite. "Society is an ideal exiftence, and not on its own account entitled to the fmalleft regard. The wealth, profperity and glory of the whole are unintelligible chimeras. Set no value on any thing, but in proportion as you are convinced of its tendency to make individual men happy and virtuous. Benefit by every practicable mode man wherever he exifts; but be not deceived by the fpecious idea of affording fervices to a body of men, for which no individual man is the better. Society was infituted, not for the fake of glory, not to furnifh fplendid materials for the page of hiftory, but for the benefit of its members. The love of our country, if we would fpeak accurately, is another of those fpecious illusions, which have been invented by impostors * Du Contrat Social, Ec. Ec. Ec.

in

in order to render the multitude the blind inflruments of their EOOK V. crooked defigns."

Meanwhile let us beware of paffing from one injurious extreme to another. Much of what has been ufually underflood by the love of our country is highly excellent and valuable, though perhaps nothing that can be brought within the ftrict interpretation of the phrafe. A wife man will not fail to be the votary of liberty and equality. He will be ready to exert himfelf in their defence wherever they exist. It cannot be a matter of indifference to him, when his own liberty and that of other men with whofe excellence and capabilities he has the beft opportunity of being acquainted, are involved in the event of the ftruggle to be made. But his attachment will be to the caufe, and not to the country. Wherever there are men who underftand the value of political juffice and are prepared to affert it, that is his country. Wherever he can most contribute to the diffusion of these principles and the real happiness of mankind, that is his country. Nor does he defire for any country any other benefit than justice.

To apply these principles to the fubject of war. And, before that application can be adequately made, it is necessary to recollect for a moment the force of the term.

Becaufe individuals were liable to error, and fuffered their ap-3 U 2 prehenfions ated.

BOOK V. CHAP. XVI. prehenfions of juftice to be perverted by a bias in favour of themfelves, government was inflituted. Becaufe nations were fufceptible of a fimilar weaknefs, and could find no fufficient umpire to whom to appeal, war was introduced. Men were induced deliberately to feek each other's lives, and to adjudge the controverfies between them, not according to the dictates of reafon and juffice, but as either fhould prove moft fuccefsful in devaftation and murder. This was no doubt in the firft inftance the extremity of exafperation and rage. But it has fince been converted into a trade. One part of the nation pays another part to murder and be murdered in their ftead; and the moft trivial caufes, a fuppofed infult or a fally of youthful ambition, have fufficed to deluge provinces with blood.

We can have no adequate idea of this evil, unlefs we vifit, at leaft in imagination, a field of battle. Here men deliberately deftroy each other by thoufands without any refentment againft or even knowledge of each other. The plain is freewed with death in all its various forms. Anguifh and wounds difplay the diverfified modes in which they can torment the human frame. Towns are burned, fhips are blown up in the air while the mangled limbs defcend on every fide, the fields are laid defolate, the wives of the inhabitants expofed to brutal infult, and their children driven forth to hunger and nakednefs. It would be defpicable to mention, along with thefe fcenes of horror, and the total fubverfion of all ideas of moral juftice they muft occafion.

fion in the auditors and fpectators, the immenfe treafures which BOOKV CHAP. XVI. are wrung in the form of taxes from those inhabitants whose refidence is at a diffance from the fcene.

After this enumeration we may venture to enquire what are the juftifiable caufes and rules of war.

It is not a justifiable reason, "that we imagine our own peo- Infufficient ple would be rendered more cordial and orderly, if we could find a neighbour with whom to quarrel, and who might ferve as a touchftone to try the characters and dispositions of individuals among ourfelves*." We are not at liberty to have recourfe to the most complicated and atrocious of all mischiefs. in the way of an experiment.

caules of war:

the acquiring a healthful and vigorous tone to the public mind :

* The reader will eafly perceive that the pretences by which the people of France were infligated to a declaration of war in April 1792 were in the author's mind in this place. Nor will a few lines be mifpent in this note in flating the judgment of an impartial obferver upon the wantonnefs with which they have appeared ready upon different occasions to proceed to extremities. If policy were in queftion, it might be doubted, whether the confederacy of kings would ever have been brought into action against them, had it not been for their precipitation ; and it might be asked, what impression they must expect to be made upon the minds of other flates by their intemperate commiffion of hoftility? But that firict juffice, which prefcribes to us, never by a hafty interference to determine the doubtful balance in favour of murder, is a fuperior confideration, in comparison with which policy is unworthy to much as to be named.

BOOK V. CHAP, XVI. the putting a termination upon private infults : It is not a jufifiable reafon, "that we have been expofed to certain infults, and that tyrants perhaps have delighted in treating with contempt the citizens of our happy flate who have vifited their dominions." Government ought to protect the tranquillity of those who refide within the sphere of its functions; but, if individuals think proper to visit other countries, they must then be delivered over to the protection of general reason. Some proportion must be observed between the evil of which we complain, and the evil which the nature of the proposed remedy inevitably includes.

the menaces or preparations of our neighbours: It is not a juftifiable reafon, "that our neighbour is preparing or menacing hoftilities." If we be obliged to prepare in our turn, the inconvenience is only equal; and it is not to be believed, that a defpotic country is capable of more exertion than a free one, when the tafk incumbent on the latter is indifpenfible precaution.

the dangerous confequences of conceffion : It has fometimes been held to be found reafoning upon this fubject, "that we ought not to yield little things, which may not in themfelves be fufficiently valuable to authorife this tremendous appeal, becaufe a difposition to yield only invites farther experiments*." Far otherwife; at least when the character of fuch

* This pretence is fuftained in Paley's Moral and Political Philofophy, Book VI. Ch. XII.

fuch a nation is fufficiently underftood. A people that will not contend for nominal and trivial objects, that maintains the precife line of unalterable juffice, and that does not fail to be moved at the moment that it ought to be moved, is not the people that its neighbours will delight to urge to extremities.

"The vindication of national honour" is a very infufficient the vindicareafon for hoftilities. True honour is to be found only in tional hointegrity and juffice. It has been doubted how far a view to reputation ought in matters of inferior moment to be permitted to influence the conduct of individuals; but, let the cafe of individuals be decided as it may, reputation, confidered as a feparate motive in the inftance of nations, can never be justifiable. In individuals it feems as if I might, confiftently with the utmost real integrity, be fo mifconstrued and misrepresented by others, as to render my efforts at ufefulnefs almost always abortive. But this reafon does not apply to the cafe of nations. Their real ftory cannot eafily be suppressed. Usefulness and public fpirit in relation to them chiefly belong to the transactions of their members among themfelves; and their influence in the transactions of neighbouring nations is a confideration evidently fubordinate. The queftion which respects the justifiable caufes of war, would be liable to few difficulties, if we were accuftomed, along with the word, ftrongly to call up to our minds the thing which that word is intended to reprefent.

tion of nanour.

519

BOOK V. CHAP. XVI.

Accurately

BOOK V. CHAP. XVI. Two legitimate caufes of war.

Accurately confidered, there can probably be but two juftifiable caufes of war, and one of them is among those which the logic of fovereigns and the law of nations, as it has been termed. proferibe: thefe are the defence of our own liberty and of the liberty of others. The well known objection to the latter of thefe cafes, is, "that one nation ought not to interfere in the internal transactions of another;" and we can only wonder that fo abfurd an objection fhould have beeen admitted fo long. The true principle, under favour of which this falfe one has been permitted to pass current, is, "that no people and no individual are fit for the poffeffion of any immunity, till they underftand the nature of that immunity, and defire to poffefs it." It may therefore be an unjuftifiable undertaking to force a nation to be free. But, when the people themfelves defire it, it is virtue and duty to affift them in the acquifition. This principle is capable of being abufed by men of ambition and intrigue; but, accurately confidered, the very fame argument that fhould induce me to exert myfelf for the liberties of my own country, is equally cogent, fo far as my opportunities and ability extend, with refpect to the liberties of any other country. But the morality that ought to govern the conduct of individuals and of nations is in all cafes the fame.

СНАР.

520

[ 521 ]

CHAP. XVII.

OF THE OBJECT OF WAR.

THE REPELLING AN INVADER. --- NOT REFORMATION ----NOT RESTRAINT --- NOT INDEMNIFICATION. --- NOTHING CAN BE A SUFFICIENT OBJECT OF WAR THAT IS NOT A SUFFICIENT CAUSE FOR BEGINNING IT. --- REFLECTION$ ON THE BALANCE OF POWER.

LET us pafs from the caufes to the objects of war. As defence is the only legitimate caufe, the object purfued, reafoning from this principle, will be circumferibed within very narrow limits. It can extend no farther than the repelling the enemy from our borders. It is perhaps defirable that, in addition to this, he fhould afford fome proof that he does not propofe immediately to renew his invafion; but this, though defirable, affords no fufficient apology for the continuance of hoftilities. Declarations of war and treaties of peace are inventions of a barbarous age, and would never have grown into eftablifhed ufages, if war had cuftomarily gone no farther than to the limits of defence.

BOOK V. CHAP. XVII. The repelling an invader.

nal

It will hereafter appear that what has been termed the crimi- Not reforma-

BOOK V. CHAP, XVII,
nal juffice of nations within themfelves, has only two legitimate objects, reftraint and reformation. Neither of thefe objects applies to the cafe of war between independent flates; and therefore ideas of criminal juffice are altogether foreign to this fubject. War, as we have already feen, perhaps never originates on the offending fide in the fentiments of a nation, but of a comparatively fmall number of individuals : and, if it were otherwife, it is not in a reciprocation of hoftilities that good fenfe would teach us to look for the means of reform.

not reftraint: Reftraint appears to be fometimes neceffary with refpect to the offenders that exift in the midft of a community, because it is the property of fuch offenders to affault us with unexpected violence; but nations cannot move with fuch fecrecy as to make an unforefeen attack an object of confiderable apprehension. The only effectual means of reftraint in this last case is by difabling, impoverishing and depopulating the country of our adversaries; and, if we recollected that they were men as well as ourfelves, and the great mass of them innocent of the quarrel against us, we should be little likely to confider these expedients with complacency.

not indemnification. Indemnification is another object of war which the fame mode of reafoning will not fail to condemn. The true culprits can never be difcovered, and the attempt would only ferve to confound the innocent and the guilty : not to mention that, nations 6 having having no common umpire, the reverting, in the conclusion of every war, to the juffice of the original quarrel and the indemnification to which the parties were entitled, would be a means of rendering the controverfy endlefs. The queftion refpecting the justifiable objects of war would be liable to few difficulties, if object of war we laid it down as a maxim, that, as often as the principle or fufficient object of a war already in existence was changed, this was to be ginning it. confidered as equivalent to the commencement of a new war. This maxim impartially applied would not fail to condemn objects of prevention, indemnification and reftraint.

BOOK V. CHAP. XVII.

Nothing can be a fufficient that is not a caufe for be-

Reflections on the bapower.

The celebrated topic of the balance of power is a mixed confideration, having fometimes been proposed as the cause for hance of beginning a war, and fometimes as an object to be purfued in a war already begun. A war, undertaken to maintain the balance of power, may be either of defence, as to protect a people who are oppreffed, or of prevention to counteract new acquisitions, or to reduce the magnitude of old poffeffions. We shall be in little danger of error however, if we pronounce wars undertaken to maintain the balance of power to be univerfally unjuft. If any people be oppreffed, it is our duty, as we have already faid, as far as our ability extends, to fly to their fuccour. But it would be well if in fuch cafes we called our interference by the name which juffice prefcribes, and fought against the injustice, and not the power. All hoftilities against a neighbouring people, becaufe they are powerful, or becaufe we impute to them evil defigns 3 X 2

BOOK V. CHAP, XVII. defigns which they have not yet begun to carry in execution. are an enormous violation of every principle of morality. If one nation chufe to be governed by the fovereign or an individual allied to the fovereign of another, as feems to have been the cafe of the people of Spain upon the extinction of the elder branch of the houfe of Auftria, we may endeavour to enlighten them on the fubject of government and imbue them with principles of liberty, but it is an execrable piece of tyranny to tell them, "You shall exchange the despot you love for the despot you hate, on account of certain remote confequences we apprehend from the acceffion of the former." The pretence of the balance of power has in a multitude of inftances ferved as a veil to the intrigue of courts, but it would be eafy to flow that the prefent independence of the different flates of Europe has in no inflance been materially supported by the wars undertaken for that purpole. The falcination of a people defiring to become the appendage of a fplendid defpotifm can rarely occur, and might perhaps eafily be counteracted by peaceable means and the diffemination of a few of the most obvious truths. The defence of a people ftruggling with oppreffion must always be just, with this fingle limitation, that the entering into it without urgent need on their part, would unneceffarily fpread the calamities of war, and diminish those energies, the exertion of which would contribute to their virtue and happines. Add to this, that the object itself. the independence of the different states of Europe, is of an equivocal nature. The defpotifm, which at prefent prevails among them, them, is certainly not fo excellent as to make us very anxious for its prefervation. The prefs is an engine of fo admirable a nature for the deftruction of defpotifm, as to elude the fagacity perhaps of the most vigilant police; and the internal checks upon freedom in a mighty empire and diffant provinces, can fcarcely be expected to be equally active with those of a petty tyrant. The reasoning will furely be good with respect to war, which has already been employed upon the fubject of government, that an inftrument, evil in its own nature, ought never to be felected as the means of promoting our purpose, in any case in which felection can be practifed. 525

BOOK V.

CHAP. XVII.

CHAP.

[ 526 ]

CHAP. XVIII.

OF THE CONDUCT OF WAR.

OFFENSIVE OPERATIONS. — FORTIFICATIONS. — GENERAL ACTION.—STRATAGEM. — MILITARY CONTRIBUTIONS. — CAPTURE OF MERCANTILE VESSELS.—NAVAL WAR.—HU-MANITY. — MILITARY OBEDIENCE. — FOREIGN POSSES-SIONS.

BOOK V. CHAP. XVIII. Offentive operations.

NOTHER topic refpecting war, which it is of importance to confider in this place, relates to the mode of conducting Upon this article our judgments will be greatly facilitated by it. a recollection of the principles already eftablished, first, that no war is justifiable but a war purely defensive; and fecondly, that a war already begun is liable to change its character in this refpect, the moment the object purfued in it becomes in any degree varied. From these principles it follows as a direct corollary, that it is never allowable to make an expedition into the provinces of the enemy, unlefs for the purpole of affifting its opprefied inha-It is fcarcely neceffary to add that all falfe cafuiftry rebitants. fpecting the application of this exception would be particularly odious; and that it is better undifguifedly to avow the corrupt principles of policy by which we conduct ourfelves, than hypocritically to claim the praife of better principles, which we fail not to wreft to the juftification of whatever we defire. The cafe of BOOK V. relieving the inhabitants of our enemy's territory and their defire of obtaining relief ought to be extremely unequivocal; we shall be in great danger of misapprehension on the fubject, when the question comes under the form of immediate benefit to ourselves; and above all we must recollect that human blood is not to be fhed upon a precarious experiment.

The little advantages of war that might be gained by offenfive operations will be abundantly compenfated, by the character of magnanimous forbearance that a rigid adherence to defence will exhibit, and the effects that character will produce upon foreign nations and upon our own people. Great unanimity at home can fcarcely fail to be the effect of fevere political juffice. The enemy who penetrates into our country, wherever he meets a man, will meet a foe. Every obftacle will oppofe itfelf to his progrefs, while every thing will be friendly and affifting to our own forces. He will fcarcely be able to procure the flighteft intelligence, or underftand in any cafe his relative fituation. The principles of defensive war are fo simple as to procure an almost infallible fuccefs. Fortifications are a very equivocal fpecies of Fortificaprotection, and will oftener be of advantage to the enemy, by being first taken, and then converted into magazines for his armies. A moving force on the contrary, if it only hovered about his march, and avoided general action, would always preferve the General real fuperiority. The great engine of military fuccefs or mifcarriage, tions.

CHAP XVII

-24

action.

BOOK V. CHAP. XVIII. carriage, is the article of provisions; and the farther the enemy advanced into our country, the more eafy would it be to cut off his fupply; at the fame time that, fo long as we avoided general action, any decifive fuccefs on his part would be impoffible. Thefe principles, if rigidly practifed, would foon be fo well underftood, that the entering in a hoftile manner the country of a neighbouring nation would come to be regarded as the infallible destruction of the invading army. Perhaps no people were ever conquered at their own doors, unlefs they were first betrayed either by divisions among themfelves or by the abject degeneracy of their character. The more we come to understand of the nature of juffice, the more it will flow itfelf to be ftronger than a hoft of foes. Men, whofe bofoms are truly pervaded with this principle, cannot perhaps be other than invincible. Among the various examples of excellence in almost every department that ancient Greece has bequeathed us, the most confpicuous is her refiftance with a handful of men against three millions of invaders.

Stratagem.

One branch of the art of war, as well as of every other human art, has hitherto confifted in deceit. If the principles of this work be built upon a fufficiently folid bafis, the practice of deceit ought in all inftances to be condemned, whether it proceed from falfe tendernefs to our friends, or from a defire to haften the downfal of injuffice. Vice is neither the most allowable nor effectual weapon with which to contend against vice. Deceit is not not lefs deceit, whether the falfhood be formed into words or be conveyed through the medium of fictitious appearances. We fhould no more allow ourfelves to millead the enemy by falfe intelligence or treacherous ambufcade, than by the breach of our declarations, or feigned demonstrations of friendship. There is no effential difference between throwing open our arms to embrace them, and advancing towards them with neutral colours or covering ourfelves with a defile or a wood. By the practice of furprife and deceit we shall oftenest cut off their straggling parties and fhed most blood. By an open display of our force we shall prevent detachments from being made, shall intercept the poffibility of fupply without unneceffary bloodfhed, and there feems no reafon to believe that our ultimate fuccefs will be lefs certain. Why fhould war be made the fcience of difingenuoufnefs and myftery, when the plain dictates of good fenfe would anfwer all its legitimate purpofes? The first principle of defence is firmness and vigilance. The fecond perhaps, which is not lefs immediately connected with the end to be attained, is franknefs and the open disclosure of our purpose even to our enemies. What aftonifhment, admiration and terror would this conduct excite in those with whom we had to contend? What confidence and magnanimity would accompany it in our own bofoms? Why should not war, as a ftep towards its complete abolition, be brought to fuch perfection, as that the purposes of the enemy might be utterly baffled without firing a mufket or drawing a fword?

BOOK V. CHAP. XVIII.

529

3 Y

Another

Another corollary not lefs inevitable from the principles which BOOK V. CHAP. XVIII. have been delivered, is that the operations of war fhould be limited as accurately as poffible to the generating no farther evils than defence inevitably requires. Ferocity ought carefully to be banished from it. Calamity should as entirely as possible be prevented to every individual who is not actually in arms, and whofe Military confate has no immediate reference to the event of the war. This tribut:ons. principle condemns the levying military contributions, and the Capture of capture of mercantile veffels. Each of these atrocities would be mercantile veffels. in another way precluded by the doctrine of fimple defence. We fhould fcarcely think of levying fuch contributions, if we never attempted to pass the limits of our own territory; and every species Naval war. of naval war would perhaps be proferibed.

Humanity. The utmost benevolence ought to be practifed towards our enemies. We should refrain from the unnecessary destruction of a fingle life, and afford every humane accommodation to the unfortunate. The bulk of those against whom we have to contend are comparatively speaking innocent of the projected injustice. Those by whom it has been most affiduously fostered are entitled to our kindness as men, and to our compassion as mistaken. It has already appeared that all the ends of punishment are foreign to the business of war. It has appeared that the genuine melioration of war, in confequence of which it may be expected abfolutely to cease, is by gradually difarming it of its ferocity. The horrors of war have sometimes been apologised by a supposition that that the more intolerable it was made, the more quickly would it BOOK v. ceafe to infeft the world. But the direct contrary of this is the Severifies do but beget feverities in return. It is a moft truth. miftaken way of teaching men to feel that they are brothers, by imbuing their minds with unrelenting hatred. The truly juft man cannot feel animofity, and is therefore little likely to act as if he did.

Having examined the conduct of war as it refpects our ene- Military obemies, let us next confider it in relation to the various defcriptions of perfons by whom it is to be fupported. We have feen how little a just and upright war stands in need of fecrecy. The plans for conducting a campaign, inftead of being, as artifice and ambition have hitherto made them, inextricably complicated, will probably be reduced to two or three variations, fuited to the different circumftances that can poffibly occur in a war of fimple defence. The better these plans are known to the enemy, the more advantageous will it be to the refifting party. Hence it follows that the principles of implicit faith and military obedience will be no longer neceffary. Soldiers will ceafe to be machines. The effential circumftance that conflitutes men machines in this fenfe of the word, is not the uniformity of their motions, when they fee the reafonableness of that uniformity. It is their performing any motion, or engaging in any action, the object and utility of which they do not clearly underftand. It is true that in every flate of human fociety there will be men of an intellectual dience.

CHAP, XVIII.

BOOK V. CHAP. XVIII. tellectual capacity much fuperior to their neighbours. But defenfive war, and probably every other fpecies of operation in which it will be neceffary that many individuals fhould act in concert, will perhaps be found fo fimple in their operations, as not to exceed the apprehenfion of the moft common capacities. It is ardently to be defired that the time fhould arrive, when no man fhould lend his affiftance to any operation, without at the fame time exercifing his judgment refpecting the honefty and the expected event of that operation.

Foreign poffeffions,

The principles here delivered on the conduct of war lead the mind to a very interefting fubject, that of foreign and diftant territories. Whatever may be the value of these principles confidered in themfelves, they become altogether nugatory the moment the idea of foreign dependencies is admitted. But in reality what argument poffeffing the fmalleft degree of plaufibility can be alledged in favour of that idea? The mode in which dependencies are acquired, must be either conquest, cession or colonization. The first of these no true moralist or politician will attempt to defend. The fecond is to be confidered as the fame thing in fubftance as the firft, but with lefs opennefs and ingenuity. Colonization, which is by much the most specious pretence, is however no more than a pretence. Are these provinces held in a ftate of dependence for our own fake or for theirs? If for our own, we must recollect this is still an usfurpation, and that juffice requires we should yield to others what we demand, for for ourfelves, the privilege of being governed by the dictates of their own reafon. If for theirs, they must be told, that it is the bufinefs of affociations of men to defend themfelves, or, if that be impracticable, to look for fupport to the confederation of their They must be told, that defence against foreign neighbours. enemies is a very inferior confideration, and that no people were ever either wife or happy who were not left to the fair development of their inherent powers. Can any thing be more abfurd than for the Weft India iflands for example to be defended by fleets and armies to be transported across the Atlantic? The fupport of a mother country extended to her colonies, is much oftener a means of involving them in danger, than of contributing to their fecurity. The connexion is maintained by vanity on one fide and prejudice on the other. If they must fink into a degrading flate of dependence, how will they be the worfe in belonging to one flate rather than another? Perhaps the first flep, towards putting a ftop to this fruitful fource of war, would be to annihilate that monopoly of trade which all enlightened reafoners at prefent agree to condemn, and to throw open the ports of our colonies to all the world. The principle which will not fail to lead us right upon this fubject of foreign dependencies, as well as upon a thousand others, is; that that attribute, however splendid, is not really beneficial to a nation, that is not beneficial to the : great mais of individuals of which the nation confifts.

BOOK V. CHAP. XVIII.

[ 534 ]

CHAP. XIX.

OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENTS AND TREATIES.

A COUNTRY MAY LOOK FOR ITS DEFENCE EITHER TO A STANDING ARMY OR AN UNIVERSAL MILITIA.—THE FORMER CONDEMNED. — THE LATTER OBJECTED TO AS OF IMMORAL TENDENCY—AS UNNECESSARY—EITHER IN RESPECT TO COURAGE—OR DISCIPLINE.—OF A COM-MANDER.—OF TREATIES.

BOOK V. CHAP. XIX. THE laft topic which it may be neceffary to examine as to the fubject of war, is the conduct it becomes us to obferve refpecting it in a time of peace. This article may be diftributed into two heads, military eftablishments and treaties of alliance.

A country may look for its defence either to a ftanding army or an univerfal militia. If military eftablishments in time of peace be judged proper, their purpose may be effected either by configning the practice of military discipline to a certain part of the community, or by making every man whose age is fuitable for that purpose a solution.

The former condemned.

The preferableness of the latter of these methods to the former

OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENTS AND TREATIES.

The man that is merely a foldier, must always be is obvious. uncommonly depraved. War in his cafe inevitably degenerates from the neceffary precautions of a perfonal defence, into a trade by which a man fells his fkill in murder and the fafety of his exiftence for a pecuniary recompense. The man that is merely a foldier, ceafes to be, in the fame fenfe as his neighbours, a citizen. He is cut off from the reft of the community, and has fentiments and a rule of judgment peculiar to himfelf. He confiders his countrymen as indebted to him for their fecurity; and, by an unavoidable transition of reafoning, believes that in a double fenfe they are at his mercy. On the other hand that every citizen fhould exercife in his turn the functions of a foldier, feems peculiarly favourable to that confidence in himfelf and in the refources of his country, which it is fo defirable he fhould enter-It is congenial to that equality, which must subfift in an tain. eminent degree before mankind in general can be either virtuous or wife. And it feems to multiply the powers of defence in a country, fo as to render the idea of its falling under the voke of an enemy in the utmost degree improbable.

There are reafons however that oblige us to doubt refpecting The latter the propriety of cultivating under any form the fyftem of military difcipline in time of peace. It is in this refpect with nations as it is with individuals. The man that with a piftol bullet is fure of his mark, or that excels his contemporaries in the exercise of the fword, can hardly escape those obliquities of underftanding

,

BOOK V. CHAP. XIX:-

OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENTS -

BOOK V. CHAP. XIX.

ftanding which these accomplishments are calculated to nourish. It is not to be expected that he fhould entertain all that confidence in reafon and diffaste of violence which fevere truth pre-It is beyond all controverfy that war, though the pracfcribes. tice of it under the prefent flate of the human fpecies may in fome inftances be unavoidable, is an idea pregnant with calamity and vice. It cannot be a matter of indifference, for the human mind to be fyftematically familiarifed to thoughts of murder and defolation. The difciple of mere reafon would not fail at the fight of a mufket or a fword to be impreffed with fentiments of abhorrence. Why expel these fentiments? Why connect the difcipline of death with ideas of feftivity and fplendour; which will inevitably happen, if the citizens, without oppreffion, are .accuftomed to be drawn out to encampments and reviews? Is it poffible that he who has not learned to murder his neighbour with a grace, is imperfect in the trade of man?

If it be replied, " that the generating of error is not infeparable from military difcipline, and that men may at fome time be fufficiently guarded against the abuse, even while they are taught the use of arms;" it will be found upon reflection that this argument is of little weight. Though error be not unalterably connected with the science of arms, it will for a long time remain to. When men are sufficiently improved to be able to handle familiarly and with application of mind the instruments of death without injury, they will also be sufficiently improved to be able to mafter any fludy with much greater facility than at prefent, and confequently the cultivation of the art military in time of peace will have ftill fewer inducements to recommend it to our choice.-To apply these confiderations to the present situation of mankind.

to

AND TREATIES.

We have already feen that the fyftem of a ftanding army is as unnecefaltogether indefenfible, and that an universal militia is a much more formidable defence, as well as infinitely more agreeable to the principles of juffice and political happinefs. It remains to be feen what would be the real fituation of a nation furrounded by other nations in the midft of which ftanding armies were maintained, which fhould neverthelefs upon principle wholly neglect the art military in feafons of peace. In fuch a nation it will probably be admitted, that, fo far as relates to mere numbers, an army may be raifed upon the fpur of occasion, nearly as foon as in a nation the citizens of which had been taught to be foldiers. But this army, though numerous, would be in want of many of those principles of combination and activity which are of material importance in a day of battle. There is indeed included in either in rethe fuppolition, that the internal flate of this people is more equal rage: and free than that of the people by whom they are invaded. This will infallibly be the cafe in a comparison between a people with a ftanding army and a people without one; between a people who can be brought blindly and wickedly to the invalion of their peaceful neighbours, and a people who will not be induced to farv :

fpect to coufight

537

BOOK V. CHAP, XD

OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENTS

BOOK V. Chap. XIX.

538

fight but in their own defence. The latter therefore will be obliged to compare the flate of fociety and government in their own country and among their neighbours, and will not fail to be imprefied with great ardour in defence of the ineftimable advantages they poffefs. Ardour, even in the day of battle, might prove fufficient. A body of men, however undifciplined, whom nothing could induce to quit the field, would infallibly be victorious over their veteran adverfaries, who, under the circumftances of the cafe, could not poffibly have an accurate conception of the object for which they were fighting, and therefore could not entertain an invincible love for it. It is not certain that activity and difcipline oppofed to ardour, have even a tendency to turn the balance of flaughter against the party that wants them. Their great advantage confifts in their power over the imagination to aftonish, to terrify and confound. An intrepid courage in the party thus affailed would foon convert them from fources of defpair into objects of contempt.

or difcipline.

But it would be extremely unwife in us to have no other refource but in the chance of this intrepidity. A refource much furer and more agreeable to juftice is in recollecting that the war of which we treat is a war of defence. Battle is not the object of fuch a war. An army, which, like that of Fabius, by keeping on the hills, or by whatever other means, rendered it impracticable for the enemy to force them to an engagement, might look with fcorn upon his impotent efforts to enflave the country.

AND TREATIES.

.

country. One advantage included in fuch a fyftem of war is, that, as its very effence is protraction, the defending army might in a fhort time be rendered as fkilful as the affailants. Difcipline, like every other art, has been reprefented by vain and interefted men as furrounded with imaginary difficulties, but is in reality exceedingly fimple; and would be learned much more effectually in the midft of real war than in the puppet flow exhibitions of a period of peace.

It is defirable indeed that we should have a commander of con- Of a commauder. fiderable skill, or rather of confiderable wifdom, to reduce this patient and indefatigable fyftem into practice. This is of much more importance than the mere difcipline of the ranks. But the nature of military wifdom has been greatly mifreprefented. Experience in this, as well as in other arts, has been unreafonably magnified, and the general power of a cultivated mind been thrown into fhade. It will probably be no long time before this quackery of professional men will be thoroughly exploded. How perpetually do we meet with those whom experience finds incorrigible; while it is recorded of one of the greateft generals of antiquity, that he fet out for his appointment wholly unacquainted with his art, and was indebted for that fkill, which broke out immediately upon his arrival, to the affiduoufnels of his enquiries. and a careful examination of those writers by whom the art had moft fuccefsfully been illustrated * ? At all events it will be admitted

3 Z 2

539

BOOK V.

* Ciceronis Lucullus, five Academicorum Liber Secundus, init.

OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENTS

BOOK V. CHAP, XIX, mitted, that the maintenance of a ftanding army or the perpetual difcipline of a nation is a very dear price to pay for the purchafe of a general, as well as that the purchafe would be extremely precarious, if we were even perfuaded to confent to the condition. It may perhaps be true, though this is not altogether clear, that a nation by whom military difcipline was wholly neglected would be expofed to fome difadvantage. In that cafe it becomes us to weigh the neglect and cultivation together, and to caft the balance on that fide to which upon mature examination it fhall appear to belong.

Of treaties.

A fecond article which belongs to the military fyftem in a feafon of peace is that of treaties of alliance. This fubject may eafily be difpatched. Treaties of alliance are in all cafes wrong, in the first place, because all absolute promises are wrong, and neither individuals nor bodies of men ought to preclude themfelves from the benefit of future improvement and deliberation. Secondly, they are wrong, becaufe they are in all cafes nugatory. Governments, and public men, will not, and ought not to hold themfelves bound to the injury of the concerns they conduct, because a parchment, to which they or their predeceffors were a party, requires it at their hands. If the concert demanded in time of need, approve itfelf to their judgment or correspond with their inclination, it will be yielded, though they were under no. previous engagement for that purpofe. Treaties of alliance ferve to no other end, than to exhibit by their violation an appearance of of profligacy and vice, which unfortunately becomes too often a powerful encouragement to the inconfiftency of individuals. Add to this, that, if alliances were engines as powerful, as they are really impotent, they could feldom be of ufe to a nation uniformly adhering to the principles of juftice. They would be ufelefs, becaufe they are in reality ill calculated for any other purpofes than those of ambition. They might be pernicious, becaufe it would be beneficial for nations as for individuals to look for refources at home, inftead of depending upon the precarious compaffion of their neighbours.

BOOK V. CHAP. XIX.

54r

[ 542 ]

CHAP. XX.

OF DEMOCRACY AS CONNECTED WITH THE TRANSACTIONS OF WAR.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS ARE OF SUBORDINATE CONSIDERA-TION .--- APPLICATION. --- FARTHER OBJECTIONS TO DE-MCCRACY-I. IT IS INCOMPATIBLE WITH SECRECY-THIS PROVED TO BE AN EXCELLENCE - 2. ITS MOVE-MENTS ARE TOO SLOW --- 3. TOO PRECIPITATE ---- EVILS OF ANARCHY CONSIDERED.

BOOK V. CHAP. XX.

External affairs are of fubordinate

TAVING thus endeavoured to reduce the fubject of war to its true principles, it is time that we should recur to the maxim delivered at our entrance upon this fubject, that confideration. individuals are every thing, and fociety, abstracted from the individuals of which it is composed, nothing. An immediate confequence of this maxim is, that the internal affairs of the fociety are entitled to our principal attention, and the external are matters of inferior and fubordinate confideration. The internal affairs are fubjects of perpetual and hourly concern, the external are periodical and precarious only. That every man fhould be impreffed with the confcioufness of his independence, and refcued from the influence of extreme want and artificial defires,

OF DEMOCRACY, &c.

defires, are purposes the most interesting that can suggest themfelves to the human mind; but the life of man might pass, in a ftate uncorrupted by ideal passions, without its tranquility being fo much as once disturbed by foreign invasions. The influence that a certain number of millions, born under the fame climate with ourselves, and known by the common appellation of English or French, shall posses over the administrative councils of their neighbour millions, is a circumstance of much too airy and distant confideration, to deferve to be made a principal object in the influence we can exert is that of a fage and upright example.

If therefore it fhould appear that of thefe two articles, internal Application. and external affairs, one muft in fome degree be facrificed to the other, and that a democracy will in certain refpects be lefs fitted for the affairs of war than fome other fpecies of government, good fenfe would not hefitate between thefe alternatives. We fhould have fufficient reafon to be fatisfied, if, together with the benefits of juffice and virtue at home, we had no reafon to defpair of our fafety from abroad. A confidence in this article will feldom deceive us, if our countrymen, however little trained to formal rules and the uniformity of mechanifm, have ftudied the profeffion of man, underftand his attributes and his nature, and have their necks unbroken to the yoke of blind credulity and abject fubmiffion. Such men, inured, as we are now fuppofing them, to a rational flate of fociety, will be full of calm confidence

BOOK V. CHAP. XX.

OF DEMOCRACY AS CONNECTED WITH

BOOK V. Chap. XX. dence and penetrating activity, and these qualities will stand them in stead of a thousand lessons in the school of military mechanism. If democracy can be proved adequate to wars of defence, and other governments be better sitted for wars of a different fort, this would be an argument, not of its imperfection, but its merit.

Farther objections to democracy:

1. it is incompatible with fecrecy: It has been one of the objections to the ability of a democracy in war, "that it cannot keep fecrets. The legiflative affembly, whether it poffefs the initiative, or a power of control only, in executive affairs, will be perpetually calling for papers, plans and information, crofs examining minifters, and fifting the policy and the juftice of public undertakings. How fhall we be able to cope with an enemy, if he know precifely the points we mean to attack, the flate of our fortifications, and the ftrength and weaknefs of our armies ? How fhall we manage our treaties with fkill and addrefs, if he be informed precifely of the fentiments of our mind and have accefs to the inftructions of our ambaffadors ?"

this proved to be an excellence: It happens in this inftance, that that which the objection attacks as the vice of democracy, is one of its moft effential excellencies. The trick of a myfterious carriage is the prolific parent of every vice; and it is an eminent advantage incident to democracy, that, though the proclivity of mind has hitherto reconciled this fpecies of administration in fome degree to the keeping of fecrets, yet 6 its its inherent tendency is to annihilate them. Why fhould difingenuity and concealment be more virtuous or more beneficial in nations than in individuals? Why fhould that, which every man of an elevated mind would difdain in his perfonal character, be entitled to more lenity and toleration, if undertaken by him as a minister of state ? Who is there that fees not, that this inextricable labyrinth was artfully invented, left the people fhould understand their own affairs, and, understanding, become inclined to conduct them ? With respect to treaties, it is to be fuspected that they are in all inftances fuperfluous. But, if public engagements ought to be entered into, what effential difference is there between the governments of two countries endeavouring to overreach each other, and the buyer and feller in any private transaction adopting a fimilar proceeding?

THE TRANSACTIONS OF WAR.

This whole fyftem proceeds upon the idea of national grandeur and glory, as if in reality thefe words had any fpecific meaning. These contemptible objects, these airy names, have from the earlieft page of hiftory been made the oftenfible colour for the most pernicious undertakings. Let us take a specimen of their value from the most innocent and laudable purfuits. If I afpire to be a great poet, a great historian, fo far as I am influenced by the dictates of reafon, it is that I may be ufeful to mankind, and not that I may do honour to my country. Is Newton the better becaufe he was an Englishman, or Galileo the worfe becaufe he was an Italian? Who can endure to put this high founding

OF DEMOCRACY AS CONNECTED WITH

BOOK V. CHAP. XX. founding nonfenfe in the balance against the best interests of mankind, which will always fuffer a mortal wound, when dexterity, artifice and concealment are made topics of admiration and applause? The understanding and the virtues of mankind will always keep pace with the manly simplicity of their designs and the undifguised integrity of their hearts.

2, its movements are too flow :

It has farther been objected to a democratical flate in its tranfactions with foreign powers, "that it is incapable of those rapid and decifive proceedings, which in fome fituations have fo eminent a tendency to enfure fuccels." If by this objection it be underflood that a democratical flate is ill fitted for dexterity and furprife, the rapidity of an affaffin, it has already received a fufficient answer. If it be meant that the regularity of its proceedings may ill accord with the impatience of a neighbouring delpot, and, like the Jews of old, we defire a king "that we may be like the other nations," this is a very unreafonable requifition. A just and impartial reasoner will be little defirous to fee his country figure high in the diplomatical roll, deeply involved in the intrigues of nations, and affiduoufly courted by foreign princes as the inftrument of their purpofes. A more groundlefs and abfurd paffion cannot feize upon any people than that of glory, the preferring their influence in the affairs of Europe to their internal happiness and virtue, for these objects will perpetually counteract and clash with each other.

5

But

But democracy is by no means neceffarily of a phlegmatic character, or obliged to take every proposition that is made to it, ad referendum, for the confideration of certain primary affemblies, like the flates of Holland. The first principle in the inflitution of government itfelf, is the neceffity, under the prefent imperfections of mankind, of having fome man or body of men to act on the part of the whole. Wherever government fubfifts, the authority of the individual must be in fome degree fuperfeded. It does not therefore feem unreafonable for a reprefentative national affembly to exercise in certain cases a difcretionary power. Those privileges, which are vefted in individuals felected out of the mafs by the voice of their fellows, and who will fpeedily return to a private flation, are by no means liable to the fame objections, as the exclusive and unaccommodating privileges of an arittocracy. Reprefentation, together with many difadvantages, has this benefit, that it is able impartially and with difcernment to call upon the moft enlightened part of the nation to deliberate for the whole, and may thus generate a degree of wildom, a refined penetration of fentiment, which it would have been unreafonable to expect as the refult of primary affemblies.

A third objection more frequently offered against democratical 3. too precigovernment is, "that it is incapable of that mature and deliberate proceeding which is alone fuitable to the decifion of fuch important concerns. Multitudes of men have appeared fubject pitate.

547

BOOK V. CHAP. XX.

OF DEMOCRACY AS CONNECTED WITH

1

BOOK V. Chap, XX. to fits of occasional infanity: they act from the influence of rage, fuspicion and defpair : they are liable to be hurried into the most unjustifiable extremes by the artful practices of an impoftor." One of the most obvious answers to this objection is. that we muft not judge of a fovereign people by the example of the rude multitude in defpotic states. We must not judge of men born to the exercise of rational functions, by the example of men rendered mad with oppreffion, and drunk with the acquifition of new born power. Another answer is, that for all men to fhare the privileges of all is the law of our nature and the dictate of justice. The cafe in this inftance is parallel to that of an individual in his private concerns. It is true that, while each man is mafter of his own affairs, he is liable to all the ftarts. He is attacked by the allurements of temptation and of paffion. the tempeft of rage, and may be guilty of the most fatal errors. before reflection and judgment come forward to his aid. But this is no fufficient reafon for depriving men of the direction of their own concerns. We fhould endeavour to make them wife and not to make them flaves. The depriving men of their felfgovernment is in the first place unjust, while in the fecond this, felf-government, imperfect as it is, will be found more falutary than any thing that can be fubfituted in its place.

Evils of anarehy confidered. The nature of anarchy has never been fufficiently underftood. It is undoubtedly a horrible calamity, but it is lefs horrible than defpotifm. Where anarchy has flain its hundreds, defpotifm has 2 facrificed facrificed millions upon millions, with this only effect, to perpetuate the ignorance, the vices and the milery of mankind. Anarchy is a fhort lived mifchief, while defpotifin is all but immortal. It is unqueflionably a dreadful remedy, for the people to yield to all their furious paffions, till the fpectacle of their effects gives firength to recovering reafon: but, though it be a dreadful remedy, it is a fure one. No idea can be fuppofed. more pregnant with abfurdity, than that of a whole people taking arms against each other till they are all exterminated. It is to defpotifin that anarchy is indebted for its fting. If defpotifm were not ever watchful for its prey, and mercilefsly prepared to take advantage of the errors of mankind, this ferment, like fo many others, being left to itfelf, would fubfide into an even, clear and delightful calm. Reafon is at all times progreffive. Nothing can give permanence to error, that does not convert it into an eftablishment, and arm it with powers to refift an invation.

ВООК V.снар. XX-

[ 550 ]

CHAP. XXI.

OF THE COMPOSITION OF GOVERNMENT.

HOUSES OF ASSEMBLY.—THIS INSTITUTION UNJUST.—DE-LIBERATE PROCEEDING THE PROPER ANTIDOTE.—SEPA-RATION OF LEGISLATIVE AND EXECUTIVE POWER CON-SIDERED.—SUPERIOR IMPORTANCE OF THE LATTER.— FUNCTIONS OF MINISTERS.

BOOK V. CHAP. XXI. Houfes of affembly. O NE of the articles which has been most eagerly infifted on by the advocates of complexity in political infitutions, is that of "checks, by which a rash proceeding may be prevented, and the provisions under which mankind have hitherto lived with tranquillity, may not be reversed without mature deliberation." We will suppose that the evils of monarchy and aristocracy are by this time too notorious to incline the speculative enquirer to feek for a remedy in either of these. "Yet it is possible, without the infitution of privileged orders, to find means that may answer a similar purpose in this respect. The representatives of the people may be distributed for example into two assess blies; they may be chosen with this particular view to constitute an upper and a lower house, and may be distinguished from each other, either by various qualifications of age or fortune, or by being being chofen by a greater or fmaller number of electors, or for a BOOK V. CHAP. XXI. fhorter or longer term."

OF THE COMPOSITION OF GOVERNMENT.

To every inconvenience that experience can produce or imagi- This inflitunation fuggeft there is probably an appropriate remedy. This remedy may either be fought in the dictates of reafon or in artificial combinations encroaching upon those dictates. Which are we to prefer? There is no doubt that the inflitution of two houses of affembly is contrary to the primary dictates of reason and juffice. How fhall a nation be governed ? Agreeably to the opinions of its inhabitants, or in opposition to them? Agreeably to them undoubtedly. Not, as we cannot too often repeat, becaufe their opinion is a standard of truth, but becaufe, however erroneous that opinion may be, we can do no better. There is no effectual way of improving the inflitutions of any people, but by enlightening their understandings. He that endeavours to maintain the authority of any fentiment, not by argument; but by force. may intend a benefit, but really inflicts an extreme injury. To fuppofe that truth can be inftilled through any medium but that of its intrinsic evidence, is the most flagrant of all errors. He that believes the most fundamental proposition through the influence of authority, does not believe a truth, but a fallhood. The proposition itself he does not understand, for thoroughly to understand it, is to perceive the degree of evidence with which it is accompanied; thoroughly to understand; it is to know the full meaning of its terms, and, by neceffary confequence, to perceive tion unjuft.

OF THE COMPOSITION

BOOK V. CHAP. XXI.

352

ceive in what refpects they agree or difagree with each other. All that he believes is, that it is very proper he fhould fubmit to ufurpation and injuftice.

It was imputed to the late government of France, that, when they called an affembly of notables in 1787, they contrived, by dividing the affembly into feven diffinct corps, and not allowing them to vote otherwife than in these corps, that the vote of fifty perfons fhould be capable of operating as if they were a majority in an affembly of one hundred and forty-four. It would have been still worfe, if it had been ordained that no measure should be confidered as the measure of the affembly, unless it were adopted by the unanimous voice of all the corps: eleven perfons might then, in voting a negative, have operated as a majority of one hundred and forty-four. This may ferve as a fpecimen of the effects of diffributing a reprefentative national affembly into two or more houfes. Nor fhould we fuffer ourfelves to be deceived under the pretence of the innocence of a negative in comparifon with an affirmative. In a country in which univerfal truth was already established, there would be little need of a reprefentative affembly. In a country into whofe inftitutions error has infinuated itfelf, a negative upon the repeal of those errors is the real affirmative.

The inftitution of two houfes of affembly is the direct method to divide a nation against itself. One of these houses will in a greater greater or lefs degree be the afylum of ufurpation, monopoly and privilege. Parties would expire as foon as they were born, in a country where opposition of fentiments and a ftruggle of interefts were not allowed to affume the formalities of diffinct inftitution.

Meanwhile a fpecies of check perfectly fimple, and which appears fufficiently adequate to the purpofe, fuggefts itfelf in the idea of a flow and deliberate proceeding which the reprefentative affembly fhould prefcribe to itfelf. Perhaps no proceeding of this affembly fhould have the force of a general regulation till it had undergone five or fix fucceffive difcuffions in the affembly. or till the expiration of one month from the period of its being Something like this is the order of the English house propofed. of commons, nor does it appear to be by any means among the worft features of our conftitution. A fyftem like this would be fufficiently analogous to the proceedings of a wife individual, who certainly would not with to determine upon the moft important concerns of his life without a fevere examination, and ftill lefs would omit this examination, if his decifion were deftined to be a rule for the conduct and a criterion to determine upon the rectitude of other men.

Perhaps, as we have faid, this flow and gradual proceeding ought in no inftance to be difpenfed with by the national reprefentative affembly. This feems to be the true line between the 4 B functions Deliberate proceeding the proper antidote.

BOOK V.

OF THE COMPOSITION

BOOK V. Chap. XXI. functions of the affembly and its ministers. It would give a character of gravity and good fenfe to this central authority, that would tend eminently to fix the confidence of the citizens in its wildom and justice. The mere votes of the affembly, as diftinguished from its acts and decrees, might ferve as an encouragement to the public functionaries, and as affording a certain degree of hope refpecting the fpeedy cure of those evils of which the public might complain; but they fhould never be allowed to be pleaded as the legal juftification of any action. A precaution like this would not only tend to prevent the fatal confequences of any precipitate judgment of the affembly within itfelf, but of tumult and diforder from without. An artful demagogue would find it much more eafy to work up the people into a fit of momentary infanity, than to retain them in it for a month in oppolition to the efforts of their real friends to undeceive them. Meanwhile the confent of the affembly to take their demand into confideration might reafonably be expected to moderate their violence.

Separation of legiflative and executive power confidered. Scarcely any plaufible argument can be adduced in favour of what has been denominated by political writers a division of powers. Nothing can feem lefs reafonable, than to preferibe any positive limits to the topics of deliberation in an affembly adequately reprefenting the people; or peremptorily to forbid them the exercise of functions, the depositaries of which are placed under their infpection and censure. Perhaps upon any emergence, gence, totally unforefeen at the time of their election, and uncommonly important, they would prove their wifdom by calling upon the people to elect a new affembly with a direct view to that emergence. But the emergence, as we shall have occasion more fully to obferve in the fequel, cannot with any propriety be prejudged, and a rule laid down for their conduct by a body prior to or diftinct from themfelves. The diffinction of legiflative and executive powers, however intelligible in theory, will by no means authorife their feparation in practice.

Legislation, that is, the authoritative enunciation of abstract or Superior imgeneral propositions, is a function of equivocal nature, and will the latter. never be exercifed in a pure flate of fociety, or a flate approaching to purity, but with great caution and unwillingnefs. It is the most absolute of the functions of government, and government itfelf is a remedy that inevitably brings its own evils along Administration on the other hand is a principle of perwith it. petual application. So long as men shall fee reason to act in a corporate capacity, they will always have occafions of temporary emergency for which to provide. In proportion as they advance in focial improvement, executive power will, comparatively fpeaking, become every thing, and legiflative nothing. Even at prefent, can there be any articles of greater importance than those of peace and war, taxation, and the felection of proper periods for the meeting of deliberative affemblies, which, as was obferved in the commencement of the prefent book, are articles of temporary

BOOK V. CHAP. XXI.

OF THE COMPOSITION

BOOK V. CHAP. XXI. rary regulation *? Is it decent, can it be juft, that thefe prerogatives fhould be exercifed by any power lefs than the fupreme, or be decided by any authority but that which moft adequately reprefents the voice of the nation? This principle ought beyond queftion to be extended univerfally. There can be no juft reafon for excluding the national reprefentative from the exercife of any function, the exercife of which on the part of the fociety is at all neceffary.

Functions of minifters.

The functions therefore of minifters and magiftrates commonly fo called, do not relate to any particular topic, refpecting which they have a right exclusive of the representative affembly. They do not relate to any fuppofed neceffity for fecrecy; for fecrets are always pernicious, and, moft of all, fecrets relating to the interefts of any fociety, which are to be concealed from the members of that fociety. It is the duty of the affembly to defire information without referve for themfelves and the public upon every fubject of general importance, and it is the duty of minifters and others to communicate fuch information, though it fhould not be exprefsly defired. The utility therefore of ministerial functions being lefs than nothing in these respects, there are only two classes of utility that remain to them; particular functions, fuch as those of financial detail or minute fuperintendence, which cannot be exercifed unlefs by one or at most by a fmall number of perfonst;

* Chap. I. p. 381.

† Ibid.

556

and

OF GOVERNMENT.

and meafures, proportioned to the demand of those neceffities 'which will not admit of delay, and fubject to the revision and cenfure of the deliberative affembly. The latter of these classes will perpetually diminish as men advance in improvement; nor can any thing be of greater importance than the reduction of that discretionary power in an individual, which may greatly affect the interests or fetter the deliberations of the many. 557

BOOK V.

CHAP,

[ 558 ]

CHAP. XXII.

OF THE FUTURE HISTORY OF POLITICAL SOCIETIES.

QUANTITY OF ADMINISTRATION NECESSARY TO BE MAIN-TAINED.—OBJECTS OF ADMINISTRATION: NATIONAL GLORY—RIVALSHIP OF NATIONS.—INFERENCES: I. COM-PLICATION OF GOVERNMENT UNNECESSARY — 2. EX-TENSIVE TERRITORY SUPERFLUOUS—3. CONSTRAINT, ITS LIMITATIONS.—PROJECT OF GOVERNMENT: POLICE —DEFENCE.

BOOK V. CHAP. XXII.

Quantity of administration necessary to be maintained. E have now endeavoured to deduce certain general principles upon most of the fubjects of legislative and executive power. But there is one very important topic which remains to be difcuffed. How much of either of these powers does the benefit of fociety require us to maintain?

Objects of administration :

national glory : We have already feen that the only legitimate object of political inftitution is the advantage of individuals. All that cannot be brought home to them, national wealth, profperity and glory, can be advantageous only to those felf interested impostors, who, from the earliest accounts of time, have confounded the underfandings ftandings of mankind the more fecurely to fink them in debafe-BOOK V. CHAP. XXII. ment and mifery.

The defire to gain a more extensive territory, to conquer or rivalihip of to hold in awe our neighbouring flates, to furpals them in arts or arms, is a defire founded in prejudice and error. Power is not Security and peace are more to be defired than a happinefs. name at which nations tremble. Mankind are brethren. We affociate in a particular diffrict or under a particular climate, becaufe affociation is neceffary to our internal tranquillity, or to defend us against the wanton attacks of a common enemy. But the rivalfhip of nations is a creature of the imagination. If riches be our object, riches can only be created by commerce; and the greater is our neighbour's capacity to buy, the greater will be our opportunity to fell. The profperity of all is the intereft of all.

The more accurately we underftand our own advantage, the lefs fhall we be difpofed to difturb the peace of our neighbour. The fame principle is applicable to him in return. It becomes us therefore to defire that he may be wife. But wifdom is the growth of equality and independence, not of injury and oppreffion. If oppreffion had been the fchool of wildom, the improvement of mankind would have been ineftimable, for they have been in that fchool for many thousand years. We ought therefore to defire that our neighbour fhould be independent. We ought nations.

OF THE FUTURE HISTORY

BOOK V. CHAP. XXII. ought to defire that he fhould be free; for wars do not originate in the unbiaffed propenfities of nations, but in the cabals of government and the propenfities that governments infpire into the people at large. If our neighbour invade our territory, all we fhould defire is to repel him from it; and for that purpofe it is not neceffary we fhould furpafs him in prowefs, fince upon our own ground his match is unequal. Not to fay that to conceive a nation attacked by another, fo long as its own conduct is fober, equitable and moderate, is an exceedingly improbable fuppofition.

Where nations are not brought into avowed hoftility, all jealoufy between them is an unintelligible chimera. I refide upon a certain fpot, becaufe that refidence is most conducive to my happiness or usefulness. I am interested in the political justice and virtue of my species, because they are men, that is, creatures eminently capable of justice and virtue; and I have perhaps additional reason to interest myself for those who live under the fame government as myself, because I am better qualified to understand their claims, and more capable of exerting myself in their behalf. But I can certainly have no interest in the infliction of pain upon others, unless fo far as they are expressly engaged in acts of injustice. The object of found policy and morality is to draw men nearer to each other, not to separate them; to unite their interests, not to oppose them.

Individuals

OF POLITICAL SOCIETIES.

Individuals cannot have too frequent or unlimited intercourfe with each other; but focieties of men have no interefts to explain and adjust, except fo far as error and violence may render explanation neceffary. This confideration annihilates at once the principal objects of that mysterious and crooked policy which has hitherto occupied the attention of governments. Before this principle officers of the army and the navy, ambaffadors and negociators, and all the train of artifices that has been invented to hold other nations at bay, to penetrate their fecrets, to traverse their machinations, to form alliances and counter alliances, fink into nothing. The expence of government is annihilated, and together with its expedee the means of fubduing and undermining the determination of its fubjects.

Another of the great opprobriums of political fcience is at the 2. extensive fame time completely removed, that extent of territory fubject to perfluous. one head, refpecting which philosophers and moralists have alternately difputed whether it be most unfit for a monarchy or for a democratical government. The appearance which mankind in a future flate of improvement may be expected to affume, is a policy that in different countries will wear a fimilar form, becaufe we have all the fame faculties and the fame wants; but a policy the independent branches of which will extend their authority over a finall territory, becaufe neighbours are best informed of each other's concerns, and are perfectly equal to their adjustment. No recommendation can be imagined

BOOK V. CHAP, XXII.

561

Inferences: I. complication of government unneceffary :

territory fu-

OF THE FUTURE HISTORY

BOOK V. imagined of an extensive rather than a limited territory, except that of external fecurity.

Whatever evils are included in the abftract idea of government, are all of them extremely aggravated by the extensiveness of its jurifdiction, and foftened under circumstances of an oppofite species. Ambition, which may be no less formidable than a pestilence in the former, has no room to unfold itself in the latter. Popular commotion is like the waves of the sea, capable where the furface is large of producing the most tragical effects, but mild and innocuous when confined within the circuit of an humble lake. Sobriety and equity are the obvious characteristics of a limited circle.

It may indeed be objected, " that great talents are the offspring of great paffions, and that in the quiet mediocrity of a petty republic the powers of intellect may be expected to fubfide into inactivity." This objection, if true, would be entitled to the moft ferious confideration. But it is to be confidered that, upon the hypothefis here advanced, the whole human fpecies would conflitute in one fenfe one great republic, and the profpects of him who defired to act beneficially upon a great furface of mind, would become more animating than ever. During the period in which this ftate was growing but not yet complete, the comparifon of the bleffings we enjoyed with the iniquities practifing among among our neighbours would afford an additional ftimulus to BOOK V. exertion *.

Ambition and tumult are evils that arife out of government in 3. confirmint, an indirect manner, in confequence of the habits, which govern- tions. ment introduces of material action extending itfelf over multitudes of men. There are other evils infeparable from its exiftence. The objects of government are the fuppreffion of violence, either external or internal, which might otherwife deftroy or bring into jeopardy the well being of the community or its members; and the means it employs is violence of a more regulated kind. For this purpofe the concentration of individual forces becomes neceffary, and the method in which this concentration is usually obtained, is also constraint. The evils of conftraint have been confidered on a former occasion +. Constraint employed against delinquents or perfons to whom delinquency is imputed, is by no means without its mifchiefs. Conftraint employed by the majority of a fociety against the minority who may differ from them upon fome queftion of public good, is calculated at first fight at least to excite a still greater disapprobation.

Both of thefe exertions may indeed appear to reft upon the fame principle. Vice is unqueftionably no more than error of

* This objection will be copioully difculled in the eighth book of the prefent work.

> + Book II, Chap. VI. 4 C 2 judgment, its limita-

563

OF THE FUTURE HISTORY

BOOK V. CHAP. XXII.

564

judgment, and nothing can juffify an attempt to correct it by force but the extreme neceffity of the cafe *. The minority, if erroneous, fall under precifely the fame general defcription. though their error may not be of equal magnitude. But the neceffity of the cafe can feldom be equally impreffive. If the idea of feceffion for example were fomewhat more familiarifed to the conceptions of mankind, it could feldom happen that the feceffion of the minority could in any degree compare in mifchievous tendency with the hoftility of a criminal offending against the most obvious principles of focial justice. The cafes are parallel to those of offenfive and defenfive war. In putting conftraint upon a minority, we yield to a fufpicious temper that tells us the oppofing party may hereafter in fome way injure us, and we will anticipate his injury. In putting conftraint upon a criminal, we feem to repel an enemy who has entered our territory and refufes to quit it.

Project of government : police : Government can have no more than two legitimate purpofes, the fuppreffion of injuffice against individuals within the community, and the common defence against external invasion. The first of these purposes, which alone can have an uninterrupted claim upon us, is fufficiently answered by an affociation of fuch an extent as to afford room for the institution of a jury, to decide upon the offences of individuals within the community, and upon the questions and controversies respecting property which may chance

* Book II, Chap. VI. Book IV, Chap. VII.

chance to arife. It might be eafy indeed for an offender to BOOK V. CHAP, XXII. escape from the limits of fo petty a jurifdiction ; and it might feem neceffary at first that the neighbouring parishes or jurifdictions fhould be governed in a fimilar manner, or at leaft fhould be willing, whatever was their form of government, to co-operate with us in the removal or reformation of an offender, whofe prefent habits were alike injurious to us and to them. But there will be no need of any express compact, and still lefs of any common centre of authority, for this purpofe. General juffice and mutual intereft are found more capable of binding men than fignatures and feals. In the mean time all neceffity for caufing the punifhment of the crime to purfue the criminal, would foon at leaft ceafe, if it ever exifted. The motives to offence would become rare : its aggravations few : and rigour fuperfluous. The principal object of punishment is reftraint upon a dangerous member of the community; and the end of this reftraint would be anfwered, by the general infpection that is exercifed by the members of a limited circle over the conduct of each other, and by the gravity and good fenfe that would characterife the cenfures of men, from whom all myftery and empiricifm were banifhed. No individual would be hardy enough in the caufe of vice, to defy the general confent of fober judgment that would furround him. It would carry defpair to his mind, or, which is better, it would carry conviction. He would be obliged, by a force not lefs irrefiftible than whips and chains, to reform his conduct.

In

OF THE FUTURE HISTORY

BOOK V. CHAP. XXII. defence.

566

In this fketch is contained the rude outline of political govern-Controverfies between parifh and parifh would be in an ment. eminent degree unreafonable, fince, if any question arofe, about limits for example, justice would prefently teach us that the individual who cultivates any portion of land, is the propereft perfon to decide to which diffrict he would belong. No affociation of men, fo long as they adhered to the principles of reafon, could poffibly have any intereft in "extending their territory. If we would produce attachment in our affociates, we can adopt no furer method than that of practifing the dictates of equity and moderation; and, if this failed in any inftance, it could only fail with him who, to whatever fociety he belonged, would prove an unworthy member. The duty of any fociety to punish offenders is not dependent upon the hypothetical confent of the offender to be punished, but upon the duty of neceffary defence.

But however irrational might be the controverfy of parifh with parifh in fuch a flate of fociety, it would not be the lefs poffible. For fuch extraordinary emergencies therefore provifion ought to be made. These emergencies are fimilar in their nature to those of foreign invasion. They can only be provided against by the concert of feveral diffricts, declaring and, if needful, inforcing the dictates of justice.

One of the most obvious remarks that fuggests itself upon 4 these thefe two cafes, of hoftility between district and district, and of BOOK V. CHAP, XXII. foreign invafion which the interest of all calls upon them jointly to repel, is, that it is their nature to be only of occafional recurrence, and that therefore the provisions to be made respecting them need not be in the ftricteft fense of perpetual operation. In other words, the permanence of a national affembly, as it has hitherto been practifed in France, cannot be neceffary in a period of tranquillity, and may perhaps be pernicious. That we may form a more accurate judgment of this, let us recollect fome of the principal features that enter into the conflictution of a national affembly.

OF POLITICAL SOCIETIES.

[ 568 ]

C H A P. XXIII.

OF NATIONAL ASSEMBLIES.

THEY PRODUCE A FICTITIOUS UNANIMITY—AN UNNATU-RAL UNIFORMITY OF OPINION.—CAUSES OF THIS UNI-FORMITY.—CONSEQUENCES OF THE MODE OF DECISION BY VOTE—1. PERVERSION OF REASON—2. CONTENTIOUS DISPUTES—3. THE TRIUMPH OF IGNORANCE AND VICE. —SOCIETY INCAPABLE OF ACTING FROM ITSELF—OF BEING WELL CONDUCTED BY OTHERS.—CONCLUSION. —MODIFICATION OF DEMOCRACY THAT RESULTS FROM THESE CONSIDERATIONS.

BOOK V. CHAP. XXIII.

They produce a fictitious unanimity : IN the first place the existence of a national affembly introduces the evils of a fictitious unanimity. The public, guided by fuch an affembly, acts with concert, or elfe the affembly is a nugatory excretcence. But it is impossible that this unanimity can really exist. The individuals who conflitute a nation, cannot take into confideration a variety of important questions, without forming different fentiments respecting them. In reality all matters that are brought before fuch an affembly are decided by a majority of votes, and the minority, after having exposed with all the power of eloquence and force of reasoning of which they are capable capable the injuffice and folly of the meafures adopted, are obliged in a certain fense to affift in carrying them into execu-Nothing can more directly contribute to the depravation tion. of the human underftanding and character. It inevitably renders mankind timid, diffembling and corrupt. He that is not accuftomed exclusively to act upon the dictates of his own underftanding, muft fall infinitely flort of that energy and fimplicity of which our nature is capable. He that contributes his perfonal exertions or his property to the fupport of a caufe which he believes to be unjuft, will quickly lofe that accurate diferimination and nice fenfibility of moral rectitude which are the principal ornaments of reafon.

NATIONAL ASSEMBLIES. 170

Secondly, the exiftence of national councils produces a certain an unnatural fpecies of real unanimity, unnatural in its character, and perni- opinions. The genuine and wholfome flate of mind is, cious in its effecte. to be unloofed from fhackles, and to expand every fibre of its frame according to the independent and individual impreffions of truth upon that mind. How great would be the progress of intellectual improvement, if men were unfettered by the prejudices of education, unfeduced by the influence of a corrupt flate of fociety, and accuftomed to yield without fear to the guidance of truth, however unexplored might be the regions and unexpected the conclusions to which the conducted us ? We cannot advance in the voyage of happinefs, unlefs we be wholly at large upon the ftream that would carry us thither : the anchor, that we at first looked upon as the instrument of our fafety, will

BOOL CHAP, XX

BOOK V.

560 uniformity of BOOK V. at last appear to be the means of detaining our progress. Unani-CHAP. XXIII mity of a certain fpecies will be the refuit of perfect freedom of enquiry, and this unanimity would, in a flate of perfect freedom, become hourly more confpicuous. But the unanimity. that refults from men's having a vifible ftandard by which to adjust their fentiments, is deceitful and pernicious.

In numerous affemblies a thousand motives influence our Caufes of this uniformity. judgments, independently of reafon and evidence. Every manlooks forward to the effects which the opinions he avows will produce on his fuccefs. Every man connects himfelf with fome fect or party. The activity of his thought is fhackled at every turn by the fear that his affociates may disclaim him. This effect is flrikingly visible in the prefent flate of the British parliament, where men, whose faculties are comprehenfive almost beyond all former example, are induced by thesemotives fincerely to efpoufe the moft contemptible and clearly. exploded errors.

Confequences of the mode vote : 1. perverfiøn of reafon :

570

Thirdly, the debates of a national affembly are difforted fromof decision by their reafonable tenour by the necessity of their being uniformly terminated by a vote. Debate and difcuffion are in their own nature highly conducive to intellectual improvement; but they lofe this falutary character the moment they are fubjected to this unfortunate condition. What can be more unreafonable, than to demand, that argument, the ufual quality of which is gradually and imperceptibly to enlighten the mind, fhould declare its effect 2

OF NATIONAL ASSEMBLIES.

effect in the close of a fingle conversation ? No fooner does this circumftance occur than the whole fcene changes its character. The orator no longer enquires after permanent conviction, but transitory effect. He feeks rather to take advantage of our prejudices than to enlighten our judgment. That which might otherwife have been a scene of philosophic and moral enquiry. is changed into wrangling, tumult and precipitation.

Another circumftance that arifes out of the decision by vote, 2. contentiis the neceffity of conftructing a form of words that shall best meet the fentiments and be adapted to the preconceived ideas of a multitude of men. What can be conceived of at once more ludicrous and difgraceful, than the fpectacle of a fet of rational beings employed for hours together in weighing particles and adjufting commas? Such is the fcene that is perpetually witneffed in clubs and private focieties. In parliaments this fort of bufinels is usually adjusted before the measure becomes a subject of public infpection. But it does not the lefs exift; and fometimes it occurs in the other mode, fo that, when numerous amendments have been made to fuit the corrupt intereft of imperious pretenders, the Herculean tafk remains at laft to reduce the chaos into a grammatical and intelligible form.

The whole is then wound up with that intolerable infult upon 3, the triall reafon and juffice, the deciding upon truth by the caffing up norance and of numbers. Thus every thing that we have been accuftomed umph of igvice.

to

4 D 2

BOOK V. CHAP. XXIII.

ous difoutes ?

OF NATIONAL ASSEMBLIES,

BOOK V. CHAP. XXIII. to effeem moft facred, is determined, at beft by the weakeft heads in the affembly, but, as it not lefs frequently happens, by the moft corrupt and difhonourable intentions.

Society incapable of acting from itfelf:

In the last place, national affemblies will by no means be thought to deferve our direct approbation, if we recollect for a moment the abfurdity of that fiction by which fociety is confidered, as it has been termed, as a moral individual. It is in vain that we endeavour to counteract the immutable laws of neceffity. A multitude of men after all our ingenuity will ftill remain no more than a multitude of men. Nothing can intellectually unite them fhort of equal capacity and identical perception. So long as the varieties of mind fhall remain, the force of fociety can no otherwife be concentrated, than by one man for a fhorter or a longer term taking the lead of the reft, and employing their force, whether material or dependent on the weight of their character, in a mechanical manner, just as he would employ the force of a tool or a machine. All government corresponds in a certain degree to what the Greeks denominated a tyranny. The difference is, that in defpotic countries mind is depressed by an uniform usurpation; while in republics it preferves a greater portion of its activity, and the ulurpation. more eafily conforms itfelf to the fluctuations of opinion.

the pretence of collective wifdom is the most palpable of all conducted by impostures. The acts of the fociety can never rife above the fuggestions fuggestions of this or that individual who is a member of it. Let us enquire whether fociety, confidered as an agent, can really become the equal of certain individuals of whom it is compofed. And here, without flaying to examine what ground we have to expect that the wifeft member of the fociety will actually take the lead in it, we find two obvious reafons to perfuade us that, whatever be the degree of wildom inherent in him that really fuperintends, the acts which he performs in the name of the fociety will be both lefs virtuous and lefs able, than under other circumftances they might be expected to be. In the first place, there are few men who, with the confcioufnefs of being able to cover their refponfibility under the name of a fociety, will notventure upon measures, less direct in their motives, or less justifiable in the experiment, than they would have chosen to adopt in their own perfons. Secondly, men who act under the name of a fociety, are deprived of that activity and energy which may belong to them in their individual character. They have a multitude of followers to draw after them, whole humours they muft confult, and to whole flownels of apprehension they muft accommodate themfelves. It is for this reafon that we frequently. fee men of the most elevated genius dwindle into vulgar leaders, when they become involved in the bufy fcenes of public life.

From these reasonings we are sufficiently authorised to con- Conclusion. clude; that national affemblies, or in other words affemblies. instituted for the joint purpose. of adjusting the differences. between

573

BOOK V.

OF NATIONAL ASSEMBLIES.

BOOK V.

between diffrict and diffrict, and of confulting respecting the beft mode of repelling foreign invafion, however neceffary to be had recourfe to upon certain occafions, ought to be employed as fparingly as the nature of the cafe will admit. They fhould either never be elected but upon extraordinary emergencies. like the dictator of the ancient Romans, or elfe fit periodically, one day for example in a year, with a power of continuing their feffions within a certain limit; to hear the complaints and reprefentations of their conflituents. The former of these modes is greatly to be preferred. Several of the reafons already adduced are calculated to flow, that election itfelf is of a nature not to be employed but when the occasion demands it. There would be no difficulty in fuggefting expedients relative to the regular originating of national affemblies. It would be most fuitable to past habits and experience, that a general election should take place whenever a certain number of diffricts demanded it. Tr would be most agreeable to rigid fimplicity and equity that an affembly of two or two hundred diffricts fhould take place, in exact proportion to the number of diffricts by whom that meafure was defired.

Modification of democracy that refults from thefe confiderations. It cannot reafonably be denied that all the objections which have been moft loudly reiterated against democracy, become null in an application to the form of government which has now been delineated. Here is no opening for tumult, for the tyranny of a multitude drunk with unlimited power, for political ambition on

OF NATIONAL ASSEMBLIES.

on the part of the few, or reftlefs jealoufy and precaution on the BOOK V. part of the many. Here no demagogue would find a fuitable occafion for rendering the multitude the blind inftrument of his pur-Men in fuch a flate of fociety would underfland their pofes. happinels and cherish it. The true reason why the mass of mankind has fo often been made the dupe of knaves, has been the mysterious and complicated nature of the focial fystem. Once annihilate the guackery of government, and the most homebred understanding will be prepared to fcorn the fhallow artifices of the ftate juggler that would miflead him.

CHAP. XXIII.

CHAP.

[ 576 ]

CHAP. XXIV.

OF THE DISSOLUTION OF GOVERNMENT.

POLITICAL AUTHORITY OF A NATIONAL ASSEMBLY-OF JURIES.-CONSEQUENCE FROM THE WHOLE.

BOOK V. CHAP. XXIV. Political authority of a national affembly :

T remains for us to confider what is the degree of authority neceffary to be vefted in fuch a modified fpecies of national affembly as we have admitted into our fystem. Are they to iffue their commands to the different members of the confederacy? Or is it fufficient that they fhould invite them to co-operate for the common advantage, and by arguments and addreffes convince them of the reafonableness of the measures they propofe? The former of these would at first be necessary. The latter would afterwards become fufficient. The Amphiciyonic council of Greece poffeffed no authority but that which derived from its perfonal character. In proportion as the fpirit of party was extirpated, as the reftleffnefs of public commotion fubfided, and as the political machine became fimple, the voice of reafon would be fecure to be heard. An appeal by the affembly to the feveral diffricts would not fail to obtain the approbation of all reafonable men, unlefs it contained in it fomething fo evidently queftionable, questionable, as to make it perhaps defirable that it should BOOK V. prove abortive.

OF THE DISSOLUTION OF GOVERNMENT.

This remark leads us one ftep farther. Why fhould not the of juries. fame diffinction between commands and invitations, which we have just made in the cafe of national affemblies, be applied to the particular affemblies or juries of the feveral diffricts ? At firft, we will fuppofe, that fome degree of authority and violence would be neceffary. But this neceffity does not arife out of the nature of man, but out of the inflitutions by which he has already been corrupted. Man is not originally vicious. He would not refuse to liften, or to be convinced by the expostulations that are addreffed to him, had he not been accuftomed to regard them as hypocritical, and to conceive that, while his neighbour, his parent and his political governor pretended to be actuated by a pure regard to his interest, they were in reality, at the expence of his, promoting their own. Such are the fatal effects of myfterioufnefs and complexity. Simplify the focial fyftem in the manner which every motive but those of usurpation and ambition powerfully recommends; render the plain dictates of juffice level to every capacity; remove the neceffity of implicit faith; and the whole fpecies will become reafonable and virtuous. It will then be fufficient for juries to recommend a certain mode of adjusting controversies, without affuming the prerogative of dicstating that adjustment. It will then be fufficient for them to invite'

4 E

OF THE DISSOLUTION

BOOK V. vite offenders to forfake their errors. If their expostulations proved in a few inflances ineffectual, the evils arising out of this proved in a few inflances ineffectual, the evils arifing out of this circumflance would be of lefs importance, than those which proceed from the perpetual violation of the exercise of private judgment. But in reality no evils would arise, for, where the empire of reason was so univerfally acknowledged, the offender would either readily yield to the expostulations of authority; or, if he resisted, though fuffering no perfonal molestation, he would feel so uneasy under the unequivocal disapprobation and observant eye of public judgment, as willingly to remove to a society more congenial to his errors.

Confequence from the whole. . The reader has probably anticipated me in the ultimate conclufion, from thefe remarks. If juries might at length ceafe to decide and be contented to invite, if force might gradually be withdrawn and reafon trufted alone, fhall we not one day find that juries themfelves and every other fpecies of public inftitution, may be laid afide as unneceffary ? Will not the reafonings of one wife man be as effectual as those of twelve ? Will not the competence of one individual to inftruct his neighbours be a matter of fufficient notoriety, without the formality of an election ? Will there be many vices to correct and much obflinacy to conquer ? This is one of the most memorable ftages of human improvement. With what delight must every well informed friend of mankind look forward to the auspicious period, the diffolution folution of political government, of that brute engine, which has been the only perennial caufe of the vices of mankind, and which, as has abundantly appeared in the progrefs of the prefent work, has mifchiefs of various forts incorporated with its fubftance, and no otherwife to be removed than by its utter annihilation !

ENQUIRY

CONCERNING

POLITICAL JUSTICE.

BOOK VI.

OF OPINION CONSIDERED AS A SUBJECT OF POLITICAL INSTITUTION.

CHAP. I.

GENERAL EFFECTS OF THE POLITICAL SUPERINTENDENCE OF OPINION.

ARGUMENTS IN FAVOUR OF THIS SUPERINTENDENCE. ANSWER.—THE EXERTIONS OF SOCIETY IN ITS CORPO-RATE CAPACITY ARE, I. UNWISE—2. INCAPABLE OF PROPER EFFECT.—OF SUMPTUARY LAWS, AGRARIAN LAWS AND REWARDS.—POLITICAL DEGENERACY NOT INCURABLE.—3. SUPERFLUOUS—IN COMMERCE—IN SPE-CULATIVE ENQUIRY—IN MORALITY.—4. PERNICIOUS— AS UNDERMINING INTELLECTUAL CAPACITY—AS SUS-PENDING INTELLECTUAL IMPROVEMENT—CONTRARY TO

TO THE NATURE OF MORALITY-TO THE NATURE OF MIND.-CONCLUSION.

BOOK VI. CHAP. I.

Arguments in favour of this fuperintendence.

PRINCIPLE, which has entered deeply into the fyftems of the writers on political law, is that of the duty of governments to watch over the manners of the people. "Government," fay they, " plays the part of an unnatural ftep-mother, not of an affectionate parent, when the is contented by rigorous punishments to avenge the commission of a crime, while fhe is wholly inattentive beforehand to imbue the mind with those virtuous principles, which might have rendered punishment unneceffary. It is the bufinefs of a fage and patriotic magiftracy to have its attention ever alive to the fentiments of the people, to encourage fuch as are favourable to virtue, and to check in the bud fuch as may lead to diforder and corruption. How long shall government be employed to display its terrors, without ever having recourfe to the gentleness of invitation? How long shall fhe deal in retrofpect and cenfure to the utter neglect of prevention and remedy ?" Thefe reafonings have in fome refpects gained additional ftrength by means of the lateft improvements and clearest views upon the fubject of political truth. It has been rendered more evident than in any former period, that government, inftead of being an object of fecondary confideration, has been the principal vehicle of extensive and permanent evil to mankind. It was natural therefore to fay, " fince government can produce fo much politive milchief, furely it can do fome pofitive good." But

But thefe views, however fpecious and agreeable they may in the first instance appear, are liable to very ferious question. If we would not be feduced by vifionary good, we ought here more than ever, to recollect the principles that have repeatedly been infifted upon and illustrated in this work, " that government is in all cafes an evil," and " that it ought to be introduced as foaringly as poffible." Nothing can be more unqueftionable than that the manners and opinions of mankind are of the utmost confequence to the general welfare. But it does not follow that government is the inftrument by which they are to be fashioned.

One of the reafons that may lead us to doubt of its fitnels for The exertions this purpofe, is to be drawn from the view we have already taken of fociety confidered as an agent *. A multitude of men may be feigned to be an individual, but they cannot become a real individual. The acts which go under the name of the fociety, are really the acts now of one fingle perfon and now of another. The men who by turns usurp the name of the whole, perpetually act under the preffure of incumbrances that deprive them of their true energy. They are fettered by the prejudices, the humours, the weakness and the vice of those with whom they act; and, after a thousand facrifices to these contemptible interests, their project comes out at laft difforted in every joint, abortive and monftrous. Society therefore in its corporate capacity can by no-of fociety in its corporate capacity are, 1. unwife :

* Book V, Chap. XXIII, p. 572.

BOOK VI. CHAP. I.

Anfwer.

means;

BOOK VI. CHAP. L

584 means be buly and intrusive with impunity, fince its acts must be expected to be deficient in wifdom.

2. incapable of proper effect.

Secondly, they will not be lefs deficient in efficacy than they are in wifdom. The object at which we are fuppoling them to aim, is to improve the opinions, and through them the manners of mankind; for manners are nothing elfe but opinions carried out into action : fuch as is the fountain, fuch will be the ftreams that are fupplied from it. But what is it upon which opinion muft be founded ? Surely upon evidence, upon the perceptions of the understanding. Has fociety then any particular advantage in its corporate capacity for illuminating the underftanding ? Can it convey into its addreffes and expoftulations a compound or fublimate of the wifdom of all its members, fuperior in quality to the individual wifdom of any? If fo, why have not focieties of men written treatifes of morality, of the philosophy of nature, or the philosophy of mind? Why have all the great steps of human improvement been the work of individuals?

If then fociety confidered as an agent have no particular advantage for enlightening the underftanding, the real difference between the dicta of fociety and the dicta of individuals must be looked for in the article of authority. But is authority a proper inftrument for influencing the opinions and manners of men? If laws were a fufficient means for the reformation of error and vice, it is not to be believed but that the world long ere this would

would have become the feat of every virtue. Nothing can be more eafy than to command men to be just and good, to love their neighbours, to practife universal fincerity, to be content with a little, and to refift the enticements of avarice and ambition. But, when you have done, will the characters of men be altered by your precepts? Thefe commands have been iffued for thoufands of years; and, if it had been decreed that every man should be hanged that violated them, it is vehemently to be fufpected that this would not have fecured their influence.

But it will be answered, " that laws need not deal thus in ge- Offumptuary nerals, but may defcend to particular provisions calculated to fe- laws and recure their fuccefs. We may inftitute fumptuary laws, limiting the expence of our citizens in drefs and food. We may inftitute agrarian laws, forbidding any man to poffefs more than a certain annual revenue. We may proclaim prizes as the reward of acts of juffice, benevolence and public virtue." And, when we have done this, how far are we really advanced in our career? If the people be previoufly inclined to moderation in expence, the laws are a fuperfluous parade. If they are not inclined, who shall execute them, or prevent their evalion? It is the misfortune in these cafes, that regulations cannot be executed but by individuals of that very people they are meant to reftrain. If the nation at . large be infefted with vice, who shall fecure us a fucceffion ofmagistrates that are free from the contagion? Even if we could furmount this difficulty, still it would be vain. Vice is ever more laws, agrarian wards.

4 F

ingenious

BOOK VI. CHAP. I.

BOOK VI. CHAP. I. ingenious in evaluon, than authority in detection. It is abfurd to imagine that any law can be executed, that directly contradicts the propenfities and fpirit of the nation. If vigilance were able fully to countermine the fubterfuges of art, the magiftrates, who thus pertinacioufly adhered to the practice of their duty, would. not fail to be torn in pieces.

> What can be more contrary to the most rational principles of human intercourfe than the inquifitorial fpirit which fuch regulations imply? Who shall enter into my house, fcrutinise my expenditure and count the difhes upon my table? Who fhall detect the ftratagems I employ to cover my real poffeffion of an enormous income, while I feem to receive but a fmall one ? Not that there is really any thing unjust and unbecoming, as has been too often fuppofed, in my neighbour's animadverting with the utmoft freedom upon my perfonal conduct. But that fuch regulations include a fystem of petty watchfulness and inspection; not contenting themfelves with animadverfion whenever the occafion is prefented, but making it the bufinefs of one man conftantly to pry into the proceedings of another, the whole depending upon the uniformity with which this is done; creating a perpetual ftruggle between the reftlefs curiofity of the first, and the artful concealment of the fecond. By what motives will you make a man an informer ? If by public fpirit and philanthropy inciting him to brave obloquy and refentment for the fake of duty, will fumptuary laws be very neceffary among a people thus far advanced vanced in virtue ? If by finister and indirect confiderations, will BOOK VI. not the vices you propagate be more dangerous than the vices you fupprefs ?

POLITICAL SUPERINTENDENCE OF OPINION.

Such must be the cafe in extensive governments : in governments of fmaller dimensions opinion would be all fufficient ; the infpection of every man over the conduct of his neighbours, when unftained with caprice, would conflitute a cenforship of the more irrefiftible nature. But the force of this cenforship would depend upon its freedom, not following the politive dictates of law, but the fpontaneous decifions of the underftanding.

Again, in the diffribution of rewards who shall fecure us against error, partiality and intrigue, converting that which was meant for the fupport of virtue into a new engine for her ruin? Not to add, that prizes are a very feeble inftrument for the generation of excellence, always inadequate to its reward where it really exifts, always in danger of being beftowed on its femblance, continually mifleading the underftanding by foreign and degenerate motives of avarice and vanity.

In truth, the whole fyftem of fuch regulations is a perpetual ftruggle against the laws of nature and neceffity. Mind will in all inftances be fwayed by its own views and propenfities. No project can be more abfurd, than that of reverfing these propenCHAP. I fities

BOOK VI. CHAP. I.

fities by the interpolition of authority. He that fhould command a conflagration to ceafe or a tempeft to be fill, would not difplay more ignorance of the fyftem of the univerfe, than he, who, with a code of regulations, whether general or minute, that he has framed in his clofet, expects to reftore a corrupt and luxurious people to temperance and virtue.

Political degeneracy not incurable.

The force of this argument refpecting the inefficacy of regulations has often been felt, and the conclusions that are deduced from it have been in a high degree difcouraging. " The character of nations," it has been faid, " is unalterable, or at leaft, when once debauched, can never be recovered to purity. Laws are an empty name, when the manners of the people are become corrupt. In vain shall the wifest legislator attempt the reformation of his country, when the torrent of profligacy and vice has once broken down the bounds of moderation. There is no longer any inftrument left for the reftoration of fimplicity and frugality. It is useless to declaim against the evils that arise from inequality of riches and rank, where this inequality has already gained an eftablifhment. A generous fpirit will admire the exertions of a Cato and a Brutus; but a calculating fpirit will condemn them, as inflicting ufelefs torture upon a patient whofe difeafe is irremediable. It was from a view of this truth that the poets derived their fictions respecting the early history of mankind; well aware that, when luxury was introduced and the fprings of mind unbent, it would be a vain expectation that fhould hope to recal men men from paffion to reafon, and from effeminacy to energy*." BOOK VI. But this conclusion from the inefficacy of regulations is fo far from being valid, that in reality,

POLITICAL SUPERINTENDENCE OF OPINION.

A third objection to the politive interference of fociety in its 3. fuperfluous: corporate capacity for the propagation of truth and virtue is, that fuch interference is altogether unneceffary. Truth and virtue are competent to fight their own battles. They do not need to be nurfed and patronifed by the hand of power.

The miftake which has been made in this cafe, is fimilar to in commerce: the miftake which is now univerfally exploded upon the fubject of commerce. It was long fuppofed that, if any nation defired to extend its trade, the thing moft immediately neceffary was for government to interfere, and inflitute protecting duties, bounties and monopolies. It is now well known that commerce never flourifhes, fo much, as when it is delivered from the guardianthip of legiflators and minifters, and is built upon the principle, not of forcing other people to buy our commodities dear when they might purchafe them elfewhere cheaper and better, but of ourfelves feeling the neceffity of recommending them by their intrinfic advantages. Nothing can be at once fo unreafonable and hopelefs, as to attempt by pofitive regulations to difarm the unalterable laws of the univerfe.

BOOK VI. CHAP. I. in fpeculative enquiry:

The fame truth which has been felt under the article of commerce, has also made a confiderable progress as to the fubjects of fpeculative enquiry. Formerly it was thought that the true religion was to be defended by acts of uniformity, and that one of the principal duties of the magistrate was to watch the progrefs of herefy. It was truly judged that the connexion between error and vice is of the most intimate nature, and it was concluded that no means could be more effectual to prevent men from deviating into error, than to check their wanderings by the fcourge of authority. Thus writers, whole political views in other refpects have been uncommonly enlarged, have told us " that men ought indeed to be permitted to think as they pleafe, but not to propagate their pernicious opinions; as they may be permitted to keep poifons in their clofet, but not to offer them to fale under the denomination of cordials *." Or, if humanity have forbidden them to recommend the extirpation of a fect which has already got footing in a country, they have however earneftly advifed the magistrate to give no quarter to any new extravagance that might be attempted to be introduced †.-The reign of thefe two errors refpecting commerce and theoretical fpeculation is nearly at an end, and it is reafonable to believe that the idea of teaching virtue through the inftrumentality of government will not long furvive them.

* Gulliver's Travels, Part II, Chap. VI.

† Mably, de la Légiflation, Liv. IV, Chap. III : des Etats Unis d'Amérique, Lettre III.

POLITICAL SUPERINTENDENCE OF OPINION.

All that is to be afked on the part of government in behalf of BOOK VI. morality and virtue is a clear ftage upon which for them to exert their own energies, and perhaps fome reftraint for the prefent upon the violent diffurbers of the peace of fociety, that the efforts of these principles may be allowed to go on uninterrupted to their natural conclusion. Who ever faw an inftance in which error unaided by power was victorious over truth? Who is there fo abfurd as to believe, that with equal arms truth can be ultimately defeated ? Hitherto every inftrument of menace or influence has been employed to counteract her. Has the made no progrefs ?-Has the mind of man the capacity to chufe falfhood and reject truth, when her evidence is fairly prefented ? When it has been once thus prefented and has gained a few converts, does fhe ever fail to go on perpetually increasing the number of her votaries? Exclusively of the fatal interference of government, and the violent irruptions of barbarifm threatening to fweep her from the face of the earth, has not this been in all inftances the hiftory of fcience ?

Nor are these observations less true in their application to the manners and morals of mankind. Do not men always act in the manner which they efteem beft upon the whole or most conducive to their intereft? Is it possible then that evidence of what is beft or what is most beneficial can be thrown away upon them? The real hiftory of the changes of character they experience in this refpect is this. Truth for a long time fpreads itfelf unobferved.

591

CHAP. I.

in morality :

BOOK VI. CHAP. I.

unobserved. Those who are the first to embrace it are little aware of the extraordinary effects with which it is pregnant. But it goes on to be ftudied and illustrated. It perpetually increases in clearness and amplitude of evidence. The number of those by whom it is embraced is gradually enlarged. If it have relation to their practical interefts, if it flow them that they may be a thousand times more happy and free than at prefent, it is impoffible that in its perpetual increase of evidence and energy, it fhould not at laft break the bounds of fpeculation, and become an animating principle of action. What can be more abfurd than the opinion, which has fo long prevailed, " that justice and an equal distribution of the means of happines may appear ever fo clearly to be the only reafonable foundation of political fociety, without ever having any chance of being reduced into practice? that oppreffion and mifery are draughts of fo intoxicating a nature, that, when once tafted, we can never afterwards refuse to partake of them? that vice has fo many advantages over virtue, that the reafonablenefs and wifdom of the latter, however powerfully exhibited, can never obtain a hold upon our affections?"

While therefore we decry the efficacy of unaffifted laws, we are far from throwing any difcouragement by that means upon the prospect of focial improvement. The true tendency of this view of the fubject is to fuggest indeed a different, but a more confistent and promising method by which this improvement is to be produced. The legitimate inftrument of effecting political reformation is truth. Let truth be incefantly fludied, illuftrated and propagated, and the effect is inevitable. Let us not vainly endeavour by laws and regulations to anticipate the future dictates of the general mind, but calmly wait till the harveft of opinion is ripe. Let no new practice in politics be introduced, and no old one anxioufly fuperfeded, till called for by the public voice. The tafk, which for the prefent fhould wholly occupy the friend of man, is enquiry, inftruction, difcuffion. The time may come when his tafk fhall be of another fort. Error, being completely detected, may indeed fink into unnoticed oblivion, without one partifan to interrupt her fall. This would inevitably be the event, were it not for the reftleffnefs and inconfiderate impetuofity of mankind. But the event may be other-Political change, by advancing too rapidly to its crifis, wife. may become attended with commotion and hazard; and it will then be incumbent on him actively to affift in unfolding the cataftrophe. The evils of anarchy have been flown to be much lefs than they are ordinarily fuppofed *; but, whatever be their amount, the friend of man will not, when they arife, timidly fhrink from the post of danger. He will on the contrary by focial emanations of wifdom endeavour to guide the underftandings of the people at large to the perception of felicity.

to

593

BOOK VI. CHAP. I.

BOOK VI. CHAP. I. 4. pernicious: In the fourth place the interference of an organifed fociety for the purpole of influencing opinions and manners, is not only ufelefs, but pernicious. We have already found that fuch interference is in one view of the fubject ineffectual. But here a diffinction is to be made. Confidered with a view to the introduction of any favourable changes in the flate of fociety, it is altogether impotent. But, though it be inadequate to change, it is powerful to prolong. This property in political regulation is fo far from being doubtful, that to it alone we are to afcribe all the calamities that government has inflicted on mankind. When regulation coincides with the habits and propenfities of mankind at the time it is introduced, it will be found fufficiently capable of maintaining thofe habits and propenfities in the greater part unaltered for centuries. In this view it is doubly pernicious, as undermining intellectual capacity : To underftand this more accurately, let us apply it to the cafe of rewards, which has always been a favourite topic with the advocates of an improved legiflation. How often have we been told, "that talents and virtues would fpring up fpontaneoufly in a country, one of the objects of whofe conftitution fhould be to fecure to them an adequate reward?" Now to judge of the propriety of this aphorifm we fhould begin with recollecting that the difcerning of merit is an individual, and not a focial capacity. What can be more reafonable than that each man for himfelf fhould effimate the merits of his neighbour?

To

POLITICAL SUPERINTENDENCE OF OPINION.

To endeavour to inftitute a general judgment in the name of the whole, and to melt down the different opinions of mankind into one common opinion, appears at first fight fo monstrous an attempt, that it is impoffible to augur well of its confequences. Will this judgment be wife, reafonable or just? Wherever each man is accuftomed to decide for himfelf, and the appeal of merit is immediately to the opinion of its contemporaries, there, were it not for the false bias of fome politive inftitution, we might expect a genuine ardour in him who afpired to excellence, creating and receiving impreffions in the judgment of an impartial audience. We might expect the judgment of the auditors to ripen by perpetual exercife, and mind, ever curious and awake, continually to approach nearer to the flandard of truth. What do we gain in compensation for this, by fetting up authority as the general oracle, from which the active mind is to inform itfelf what fort of excellence it fhould feek to acquire. and the public at large what judgment they fhould pronounce upon the efforts of their contemporaries? What fhould we think of an act of parliament appointing fome particular individual prefident of the court of criticifm, and judge in the laft refort of the literary merit of dramatic compositions? Is there any folid reafon why we fhould expect better things, from authority ufurping the examination of moral or political excellence?

Nothing can be more unreafonable than the attempt to retain men in one common opinion by the distate of authority. The 4 G 2 opinion BOOK VI.

BOOK VI. CHAP. I.

opinion thus obtruded upon the minds of the public is not their real opinion; it is only a project by which they are rendered incapable of forming an opinion. Whenever government affumes to deliver us from the trouble of thinking for ourfelves, the only confequences it produces are those of torpor and imbecility. Wherever truth flands in the mind unaccompanied by the evidence upon which it depends, it cannot properly be faid to be apprehended at all. Mind is in this cafe robbed of its effential character and genuine employment, and along with them must be expected to lofe all that which is capable of rendering its operations falutary and admirable. Either mankind will refift the affumptions of authority undertaking to fuperintend their opinions, and then these affumptions will produce no more than an ineffectual ftruggle; or they will fubmit, and then the effects will be injurious. He that in any degree configns to another the tafk of dictating his opinions and his conduct, will ceafe to enquire for himfelf, or his enquiries will be languid and inanimate.

Regulations will originally be infituted in favour either of falfhood or truth. In the firft cafe no rational enquirer will pretend to alledge any thing in their defence; but, even fhould truth be their object, yet fuch is their nature, that they infallibly defeat the very purpofe they were intended to ferve. Truth, when originally prefented to the mind, is powerful and invigorating; but, when attempted to be perpetuated by political inftitution, becomes flaccid and lifelefs. Truth in its unpatronifed flate flrengthens and improves improves the underftanding; becaufe in that ftate it is embraced only fo far as it is perceived to be truth. But truth, when recommended by authority, is weakly and irrefolutely embraced. The opinions I entertain are no longer properly my own; I repeat them as a leffon appropriated by rote, but I do not ftrictly fpeaking underftand them, and I am not able to affign the evidence upon which they reft. My mind is weakened, while it is pretended to be improved. Inftead of the firmnels of independence, I am taught to bow to authority I know not why. Perfons thus trammelled, are not firicily fpeaking capable of a fingle virtue. The first duty of man is to take none of the principles of conduct upon truft, to do nothing without a clear and individual conviction that it is right to be done. He that refigns his underftanding upon one particular topic, will not exercife it vigoroufly upon If he be right in any inflance, it will be inadvertently others. and by chance. A confcioufnels of the degradation to which he is fubjected will perpetually haunt him; or at leaft he will want the confciousnefs that accrues from independent confideration, and will therefore equally want that intrepid perfeverance, that calm felf approbation that grows out of independence. Such beings are the mere dwarfs and mockery of men, their efforts comparatively pufillanimous, and the vigour with which they fhould execute their purpofes, fuperficial and hollow.

Strangers to conviction, they will never be able to diftinguifh as fufpending between prejudice and reafon. Nor is this the worft. Even improvement;

BOOK VI. CHAP. I.

BOOK VI. CHAP. I.

598

when the glimpfes of enquiry fuggeft themfelves, they will not dare to yield to the temptation. To what purpofe enquire, when the law has told me what to believe and what must be the termination of my enquiries? Even when opinion properly fo called fuggefts itfelf, I am compelled, if it differ in any degree from the eftablished fystem, to shut my eyes, and loudly profess my adherence where I doubt the moft. This compulsion may exift in many different degrees. But, fuppofing it to amount to no more than a very flight temptation to be infincere, what judgment must we form of fuch a regulation either in a moral or intellectual view? of a regulation, inviting men to the profession of certain opinions by the proffer of a reward, and deterring them from a fevere examination of their juffice by penalties and difabilities? A fystem like this does not content itself with habitually unnerving the mind of the great mafs of mankind through all its ranks, but provides for its own continuance by debauching or terrifying the few individuals, who, in the midft of the general emafculation, might retain their curiofity and love of enterprife. We may judge how pernicious it is in its operation in this refpect by the long reign of papal ufurpation in the dark ages, and the many attacks upon it that were fuppreffed, previoully to the fuccefsful one of Luther. Even yet, how few are there that venture to examine into the foundation of Mahometanifm and Christianity, or the effects of monarchy and aristocratical inftitution, in countries where those fystems are established by law? Supposing men were free from perfecution for their hoffilities hofilities in this refpect, yet the inveftigation could never be impartial, while fo many allurements are held out, inviting men to a decifion in one particular way.

POLITICAL SUPERINTENDENCE OF OPINION.

To these confiderations it should be added, that what is right contrary to under certain circumftances to-day, may by an alteration in those morality: circumftances become wrong to-morrow. Right and wrong are the refult of certain relations, and those relations are founded in the refpective qualities of the beings to whom they belong. Change those qualities, and the relations become altogether different. The treatment that I am bound to beftow upon any one depends upon my capacity and his circumftances. Increafe the first, or vary the fecond, and I am bound to a different treatment. I am bound at prefent to fubject an individual to forcible reftraint. becaufe I am not wife enough by reafon alone to change his vicious propenfities. The moment I can render myfelf wife enough, I ought to confine myfelf to the latter mode. It is perhaps right to fuffer the negroes in the Weft Indies to continue in flavery, till they can be gradually prepared for a flate of liberty. Univerfally it is a fundamental principle in found political fcience, that a nation is beft fitted for the amendment of its civil government by being made to underftand and defire the advantage of that amendment, and the moment it is fo underftood and defired it ought to be introduced. But, if there be any truth in these views, nothing can be more adverse to reason or incon-6 fiftent

599

GENERAL EFFECTS OF THE

CHAP. I.

EOOK VI. fiftent with the nature of man, than politive regulations tending to continue a certain mode of proceeding when its utility is gone.

to the nature of mind.

If we would be ftill more completely aware of the pernicious tendency of politive inflitutions, we ought in the laft place explicitly to contraft the nature of mind and the nature of govern-It is one of the most unquestionable properties of mind to ment. be fusceptible of perpetual improvement. It is the inalienable tendency of politive inftitution, to retain that with which it is conversant for ever in the same state. Is then the perfectibility of understanding an attribute of trivial importance? Can we recolleft with coldnefs and indifference the advantages with which this quality is pregnant to the lateft pofterity? And how are thefe advantages to be fecured ? By inceffant industry, by a curiofity never to be diffeartened or fatigued, by a fpirit of enquiry to which a fublime and philanthropic mind will allow no paufe. The circumftance of all others most neceffary, is that we should never fland flill, that every thing most interesting to the general welfare, wholly delivered from reftraint, fhould be in a ftate of change, moderate and as it were imperceptible, but continual. Is there any thing that can look with a more malignant afpect upon the general welfare, than an inftitution tending to give permanence to certain fyftems and opinions? Such inftitutions are two ways pernicious; first, which is most material, because they render all all the future advances of mind infinitely tedious and operofe; fecondly, becaufe, by violently confining the ftream of reflexion, and holding it for a time in an unnatural ftate, they compel it at laft to rufh forward with impetuofity, and thus occafion calamities, which, were it free from reftraint, would be found extremely foreign to its nature. Is it to be believed that, if the interference of politive inflitution were out of the queftion, the progrefs of mind in paft ages would have been fo flow, as to have ftruck the majority of ingenuous obfervers with defpair? The fcience of Greece and Rome upon the fubjects of political juffice was in many refpects extremely imperfect : yet could we have been fo long in appropriating their difcoveries, had not the allurements of reward and the menace of perfecution united to induce us, not to truft to the firft and fair verdict of our own underftandings?

600

POLITICAL SUPERINTENDENCE OF OPINION.

The juft conclution from the above reafonings is nothing more Conclution. than a confirmation, with fome difference in the mode of application, of the fundamental principle, that government is little capable of affording benefit of the firft importance to mankind. It is calculated to induce us to lament, not the apathy and indifference, but the inaufpicious activity of government. It incites us to look for the moral improvement of the fpecies, not in the multiplying of regulations, but in their repeal. It teaches us that truth and virtue, like commerce, will then flourifh moft, when leaft fubjected to the miftaken guardianfhip of authority and laws. This maxim will rife upon us in its importance, in proportion

601

BOOK VI. CHAP. I.

GENERAL EFFECTS, &c.

BOOK VI. CHAP. I. proportion as we connect it with the numerous departments of political juffice to which it will be found to have relation. As faft as it fhall be adopted into the practical fyftem of mankind, it will go on to deliver us from a weight intolerable to mind, and in the higheft degree inimical to the progress of truth.

CHAP.

F 603 1

CHAP. II.

OF RELIGIOUS ESTABLISHMENTS.

THEIR GENERAL TENDENCY .--- EFFECTS ON THE CLERGY : THEY INTRODUCE, I. IMPLICIT FAITH ---- 2. HYPOCRISY: TOPICS BY WHICH AN ADHERENCE TO THEM IS VINDI-CATED .- EFFECTS ON THE LAITY .- APPLICATION.

NE of the most striking instances of the injurious effects of BOOK VI. the political patronage of opinion, as it at prefent exifts in the world, is to be found in the fyftem of religious conformity, Let us take our example from the church of England, by the conftitution of which fubscription is required from its clergy to thirtynine articles of precife and dogmatical affertion upon almost every fubject of moral and metaphyfical enquiry. Here then we have to confider the whole honours and revenues of the church, from the archbishop who takes precedence next after the princes of the blood royal to the meaneft curate in the nation, as employed in fupport of a fystem of blind fubmission and abject hypocrify. Is there one man through this numerous hierarchy that is at liberty to think for himfelf? Is there one man among them that can lay his hand upon his heart, and declare, upon his honour and confcience, that his emoluments have no effect in influencing his 4H 2 judgment?

tendency.

BOOK VI. judgment? The declaration is literally impoffible. The moft CHAP. II. that an honeft man under fuch circumftances can fay is, "I hope not: I endeavour to be impartial."

Effects on the clergy : they introduce, 1. implicit faith :

604

First, the fystem of religious conformity is a fystem of blind fubmiffion. In every country poffeffing a religious establishment. the ftate, from a benevolent care it may be for the manners and opinions of its fubjects, publicly encourages a numerous clafs of men to the fludy of morality and virtue. What inflitution, we might naturally be led to enquire, can be more favourable to public happiness? Morality and virtue are the most interesting topics of human fpeculation; and the beft effects might be expected to refult from the circumftance of many perfons, perpetually receiving the most liberal education, and fetting themfelves apart, for the express cultivation of thefe topics. But unfortunately thefe very men are fettered in the outfet by having a code of propositions put into their hands, in a conformity to which all their enquiries must terminate. The natural tendency of fcience is to increase from age to age, and proceed from the humbleft beginnings to the moft admirable But care is taken in the prefent cafe to anticipate conclutions. thefe conclusions, and to bind men by promifes and penalties not to improve upon the wifdom of their anceftors. The plan is to guard against degeneracy and decline, but never to advance. It is founded in the moft fovereign ignorance of the nature of mind, which never fails to do either the one or the other.

Secondly,

Secondly, the tendency of a code of religious conformity is to make men hypocrites. To understand this it may be useful to recollect the various fubterfuges that have been invented by ingenious men to apologife for the fubicription of the English clergy. It is obfervable by the way that the articles of the church are founded upon the creed of the Calvinifts, though for one hundred and fifty years paft it has been accounted difreputable among the clergy to be of any other than the oppofite, or Arminian tenets. Volumes have been written to prove that, while thefe articles express predefinarian fentiments, they are capable of a different conftruction, and that the fubfcriber has a right to take advantage of that conftruction. Divines of another clafs have refted their arguments upon the known good character and benevolent intentions of the first reformers, and have concluded that they could never intend to tyrannife over the confciences of men, or preclude the refult of farther information. Laftly, there are many who have treated the articles as articles of peace, and inferred that, though you did not believe, you might allow yourfelf in the difingenuity of fubfcribing them. provided you added to it the farther guilt of conftantly refraining to oppofe what you confidered as an adulteration of divine truth.

It would perhaps be regarded as incredible, if it refted upon the evidence of hiftory alone, that a whole body of men, fet apart as the inftructors of mankind, weaned as they are expected to be from temporal ambition, and maintained from the fuppofition BOOK VI. CHAP. II.

2 hypocrify :

topics by which an adherence to them is vindicated.

BOOK VI. fition that the existence of human virtue and divine truth CHAP. II. depends on their exertions, fhould with one confent employ themfelves in a cafuiltry, the object of which is to prove the propriety of a man's declaring his affent to what he does not believe. These men either credit their own subterfuges, or they do not. If they do not, what can be expected from men fo unprincipled and profligate? With what front can they exhort other men to virtue, with the brand of vice upon their own foreheads? If they do, what must be their portion of moral fenfibility and difcernment? Can we believe that men fhall enter upon their profession with fo notorious a perversion of reason and truth, and that no confequences will flow from it to infect their general character ? Rather, can we fail to compare their unnatural and unfortunate state, with the profound wildom and determined virtue which their industry and exertions would unqueftionably have produced, if they had been left to their genuine operation? They are like the victims of Circe, to whom human underftanding was preferved entire, that they might more exquifitely feel their degraded condition. They are incited to ftudy and to a thirft after knowledge, at the fame time that the fruits of knowledge are conftantly withheld from their unfuccefsful attempts. They are held up to their contemporaries as the profeffors of truth, and political inftitution tyrannically commands them, in all the varieties of underftanding and fucceffion of ages, to model themfelves to one common ftandard.

606

2

Such

Such are the effects that a code of religious conformity produces upon the clergy themfelves; let us confider the effects that are produced upon their countrymen. They are bid to look for inftruction and morality to a denomination of men, formal, embarraffed and hypocritical, in whom the main fpring of intellect is unbent and incapable of action. If the people be not blinded with religious zeal, they will difcover and defpife the imperfections of their fpiritual guides. If they be fo blinded, they will not the lefs transplant into their own characters the imbecil and unworthy fpirit they are not able to detect. Is virtue fo deficient in attractions as to be incapable of gaining adherents to her ftandard ? Far otherwife, Nothing can bring the wifdom of a just and pure conduct into question, but the circumstance of its being recommended to us from an equivocal quarter. The most malicious enemy of mankind could not have invented a a fcheme more destructive of their true happiness, than that of hiring at the expence of the flate a body of men, whofe bufinefs it fhould feem to be to dupe their contemporaries into the practice of virtue.

One of the leffons that powerful facts are perpetually reading to the inhabitants of fuch countries, is that of duplicity and prevarication in an order of men, which, if it exift at all, ought to exift only for reverence. Do you think that this prevarication is not a fubject of general notoriety ? Do you think that the first idea that rifes to the understanding of the multitude at fight of a clergy-

BOOK VI. CHAP. II. Effects on the laity.

бо7

608

BOOK VI. CHAP. II. a clergyman, is not that of a man who inculcates certain propofitions, not fo properly becaufe he thinks them true or thinks them interefting, as becaufe he is hired to the employment? Whatever inftruction a code of religious uniformity may fail to convey, there is one that it always communicates, the wifdom of effimating an unreferved and difinterefted fincerity at a very cheap rate. Such are the effects that are produced by political inftitution, at a time when it most zealoufly intends with parental care to guard its fubjects from feduction and depravity.

Thefe arguments do not apply to any particular articles and Application. creeds, but to the very notion of ecclefiaftical eftablishments in general. Wherever the flate fets apart a certain revenue for the fupport of religion, it will infallibly be given to the adherents of fome particular opinions, and will operate in the manner of prizes to induce men at all events to embrace and profefs those opinions. Undoubtedly, if I think it right to have a fpiritual inftructor to guide me in my refearches and at flated intervals to remind me of my duty, I ought to be at liberty to take the proper fteps to fupply myfelf in this refpect. A prieft, who thus derives his miffion from the unbiaffed judgment of his parishioners, will stand a chance to posses beforehand and independently of corrupt influence the requifites they demand. But why fhould I be compelled to contribute to the fupport of an inftitution, whether I approve of it or no? If public worfhip be conformable to reafon, reafon without doubt will prove adequate

to

RELIGIOUS ESTABLISHMENTS. O F

to its vindication and support. If it be from God, it is profana- BOOK VI. tion to imagine that it ftands in need of the alliance of the ftate. It must be in an eminent degree artificial and exotic, if it be incapable of preferving itfelf in exiftence, otherwife than by the inaufpicious interference of political inftitution.

CHAP. II.

609

[ 610 ]

CHAP. III.

OF THE SUPPRESSION OF ERRONEOUS OPINION IN RELIGION AND GOVERNMENT.

OF HERESY.—ARGUMENTS BY WHICH THE SUPPRESSION OF HERESY IS RECOMMENDED.—ANSWER.—IGNORANCE NOT NECESSARY TO MAKE MEN VIRTUOUS.—DIFFERENCE ÔF OPINION NOT SUBVERSIVE OF PUBLIC SECURITY.— REASON, AND NOT FORCE, THE PROPER CORRECTIVE OF SOPHISTRY.—ABSURDITY OF THE ATTEMPT TO RE-STRAIN THOUGHT—TO RESTRAIN THE FREEDOM OF SPEECH.—CONSEQUENCES THAT WOULD RESULT.—FAL-LIBILITY OF THE MEN BY WHOM AUTHORITY IS EXER-CISED.—OF ERRONEOUS OPINIONS IN GOVERNMENT.— INIQUITY OF THE ATTEMPT TO RESTRAIN THEM.— TENDENCY OF UNLIMITED POLITICAL DISCUSSION.

BOOK VI. CHAP. III. Of herefy. HE fame views which have prevailed for the introduction of religious eftablifhments, have inevitably led to the idea of provifions againft the rife and progrefs of herefy. No arguments can be adduced in favour of the political patronage of truth, that will not be equally cogent in behalf of the political difcouragement of error. Nay, they will, of the two, be moft cogent in the latter cafe; for error and mifreprefentation are the irreconcilable OF THE SUPPRESSION, &c.

concilable enemies of virtue, and if authority were the true means to difarm them, there would then at leaft be no need of politive provisions to affift the triumph of truth. It has however happened that this argument, though more tenable, has had fewer adherents. Men are more eafily reconciled to abufe in the diffribution of rewards, than in the infliction of penalties. It will not therefore be requisite laboriously to infift upon the refutation of this principle; its difcuffion is principally neceffary for the fake of method.

Various arguments have been alledged in defence of this Arguments reftraint. "The importance of opinion as a general proposition fupprefilion is notorious and unqueftionable. Ought not political inftitution to take under its infpection that root from which all our actions are ultimately derived? The opinions of men must be expected to be as various as their education and their temper: ought not government to exert its forefight to prevent this difcord from breaking out into anarchy and violence? There is no proposition fo abfurd or fo hoftile to morality and public good, as not to have found its votaries : will there be no danger in fuffering thefe eccentricities to proceed unmolefted, and every perverter of truth and justice to make as many converts as he isable? It has been found indeed a hopelefs tafk to endeavour toextirpate by violence errors already eftablished; but is it not the duty of government to prevent their afcendancy, to check the growth of their adherents and the introduction of herefies hitherto unknown? Can those perfons, to whom the care of the.

4 I 2

by which the of herefy has been recommended.

general

BOOK VL.

CHAP. III.

612 OF THE SUPPRESSION OF ERRONEOUS OPINIONS

BOOK VI. general welfare is confided, or who are fitted by their fituation CHAP. III. ----or their talents to fuggest proper regulations to the adoption of the community, be justified in conniving at the foread of fuch extravagant and pernicious opinions as firike at the root of order and morality ? Simplicity of mind and an understanding undebauched with fophiftry have ever been the characteriftics of a people among whom virtue has flourished: ought not government to exert itfelf to exclude the inroad of qualities oppofite to thefe? It is thus that the friends of moral justice have ever contemplated with horror the progress of infidelity and latitudinarian principles. It was thus that the elder Cato viewed with grief the importation into his own country of that plaufible and loquacious philosophy by which Greece had already been corrupted *."

Anfwer.

Ignorance not neceffary to make men wirtuous. There are feveral trains of reflexion which these reasonings fuggest. None of them can be more important than that which may affiss us in detecting the error of the elder Cato, and of other perfons who have been the zealous but mistaken advocates of virtue. Ignorance is not necessary to render men virtuous. If it were, we might reasonably conclude that virtue was an imposture, and that it was our duty to free ourselves from its:

* The reader will confider this as the language of the objectors. The most eminent of the Greek philosophers were in reality diftinguished from all other teachers, by the fortitude with which they conformed to the precepts they taught.

fhackles.

IN RELIGION AND GOVERNMENT.

fhackles. The cultivation of the underftanding has no tendency BOOK VI. to corrupt the heart. A man who fhould poffefs all the fcience of Newton and all the genius of Shakespeare, would not on that account be a bad man. Want of great and comprehensive views had as confiderable a fhare as benevolence in the grief of Cato. It is like the taking to pieces an imperfect machine in order by reconftructing it to enchance its value. An uninformed and timid spectator would be frightened at the temerity of the artist, at the confused heap of pins and wheels that were laid afide at random, and would take it for granted that nothing but deftruction would be the confequence. But he would be difappointed. It is thus that the extravagant fallies of mind are the prelude of the higheft wifdom, and that the dreams of Ptolemy were deftined to precede the difcoveries of Newton.

The event cannot be other than favourable. Mind would elfe ceafe to be mind. It would be more plaufible to fay that the perpetual cultivation of the understanding will terminate in madnefs, than that it will terminate in vice. As long as enquiry is fuffered to proceed, and fcience to improve, our knowledge is perpetually increafed. Shall we know everything elfe, and nothing of ourfelves? Shall we become clear fighted and penetrating in all other fubjects, without increasing our penetration upon the fubject of man? Is vice most truly allied to wisdom or to folly? Can mankind perpetually increase in wifdom, without increasing in the knowledge of what it is wife for them to do? Can a man have I

CHAP

614 OF THE SUPPRESSION OF ERRONEOUS OPINIONS

BOOK VI. CHAP. III. have a clear difcernment, unclouded with any remains of former miftake, that this is the action he ought to perform, moft conducive to his own intereft and to the general good, moft delightful at the inftant and fatisfactory in the review, moft agreeable to reafon, juftice and the nature of things, and refrain from performing it? Every fyftem which has been conftructed relative to the nature of fuperior beings and Gods, amidft all its other errors has reafoned truly upon thefe topics, and taught that the increase of wifdom and knowledge led, not to malignity and tyranny, but to benevolence and juffice.

Difference of opinion not fubverfive of public fecumity.

Secondly, it is a miftake to fuppofe that fpeculative differences of opinion threaten materially to difturb the peace of fociety. It is only when they are enabled to arm themfelves with the authority of government, to form parties in the flate, and to flruggle for that political alcendancy which is too frequently exerted in fupport of or in opposition to fome particular creed, that they become dangerous. Wherever government is wife enough to maintain an inflexible neutrality, thefe jarring fects are always found to live together with fufficient harmony. The very means that have been employed for the prefervation of order, have been the only means that have led to its diffurbance. The moment government refolves to admit of no regulations oppreffive to either party, controverly finds its level, and appeals to argument and reafon, inftead of appealing to the fword or the ftake. The moment government defcends to wear the badge of a fect, religious 3

IN RELIGION AND GOVERNMENT.

gious war is commenced, the world is difgraced with inexpiable BOOK VI. CHAP. III. broils and deluged with blood.

Thirdly, the injuffice of punishing men for their opinions and Reafon, and arguments will be still more visible, if we reflect a little on the na- proper corture of punishment. Punishment is one of those classes of coer- forhitry. cion, the multiplication of which is fo much to be deprecated, and which nothing but the most urgent necessity can in any cafe juftify. That neceffity is commonly admitted to exift, where a man has proved by his unjuft actions the injurioufnefs of his character, and where the injury, the repetition of which is to be apprehended, is of fuch a nature as to be committed before we can have fufficient notice to guard ourfelves against it. But no fuch neceffity can poffibly exift in the cafe of falfe opinions and perverfe arguments. Does any man affert falfhood ? Nothing farther can be defired than that it fhould be confronted with truth. Does he bewilder us with fophiftry ? Introduce the light of reafon, and his deceptions will vanish. There is in this cafe a clear line of diffinction. In the only admiffible province of punifhment force it is true is introduced, but it is only in return for force previoufly exerted. Where argument therefore, erroneous flatements and misrepresentation alone are employed, it is by argument only that they muft be encountered. We fhould not be creatures of a rational and intellectual nature, if the victory of truth over error were not ultimately certain.

not force, the rective of

σiς

OF THE SUPPRESSION OF ERRONEOUS OPINIONS

BOOK VI. CHAP. III.

616

Abfurdity of the attempt to reftrain thought :

To enable us to conceive properly of the value of laws for the punifhment of herefy, let us fuppofe a country to be fufficiently provided with fuch laws, and obferve the refult. The object is to prevent men from entertaining certain opinions, or in other words from thinking in a certain way. What can be more abfurd than to undertake to put fetters upon the fubtlety of thought ? How frequently does the individual who defires to reftrain it in himfelf, fail in the attempt? Add to this, that prohibition and menace in this refpect do but give new reftleffnefs to the curiofity of the mind. I must not think of the possibility, that there is no God; that the flupendous miracles of Mofes and Chrift were never really performed; that the dogmas of the Athanafian creed I muft fhut my eyes, and run blindly into all the are erroneous. opinions, religious and political, that my anceftors regarded as facred. Will this in all inftances be poffible?

There is another confideration, trite indeed, but the tritenefs of which is an additional argument of its truth. Swift fays "Men ought to be permitted to think as they pleafe, but not to propagate their pernicious opinions *." The obvious anfwer to this is, "We are much obliged to him: how would he be able to punifh our herefy, even if he defired it, fo long as it was concealed ?" The attempt to punifh opinion is abfurd: we may be filent

* See above, Chap. I, p. 590.

IN RELIGION AND GOVERNMENT.

filent refpecting our conclusions, if we pleafe; the train of think-BOOK VL CHAP. III. ing by which those conclusions are generated cannot fail to be filent.

" But, if men be not punished for their thoughts, they may be to reftrain the punished for uttering those thoughts." No. This is not lefs impoffible than the other. By what arguments will you perfuade every man in the nation to exercife the trade of an informer ? By what arguments will you perfuade my bofoni friend, with whom I repofe all the thoughts of my heart, to repair immediately from my company to a magistrate, in order to procure my commitment for fo doing to the prifons of the inquifition? In countries where this is attempted, there will be a perpetual ftruggle, the government endeavouring to pry into our most fecret transactions, and the people bufy to countermine, to outwit and to deteft their fuperintendents.

But the most valuable confideration which this part of the Confequences fubject fuggefts, is, fuppofing all this were done, what judgment refult. must we form of the people among whom it is done? Though all this cannot, yet much may be performed; though the embryo cannot be annihilated, it may be prevented from ever expanding itfelf into the dimenfions of a man. The arguments by which we were fuppofing a fyftem for the reftraint of opinion to be recommended, were arguments derived from a benevolent anxiety for the virtue of mankind, and to prevent their degene-freedom of fpeech.

that would racy.

618 OF THE SUPPRESSION OF ERRONEOUS OPINIONS

BOOK VI. CHAP. III. racy. Will this end be accomplified? Let us contraft a nation of men, daring to think, to fpeak and to act what they believe to be right, and fettered with no fpurious motives to diffuade them from right, with a nation that fears to fpeak, and fears to think upon the moft intercfting fubjects of human enquiry. Can any fpectacle be more degrading than this timidity? Can men in whom mind is thus annihilated be capable of any good or valuable purpofe? Can this moft abject of all flaveries be the genuine ftate, the true perfection of the human fpecies?

Fallibility of the men by whom authority is exercifed. Another argument, though it has often been flated to the world, deferves to be mentioned in this place. Governments, no more than individual men, are infallible. The cabinets of princes and the parliaments of kingdoms, if there be any truth in confiderations already flated *, are often lefs likely to be right in their conclutions than the theorift in his clofet. But, difiniffing the eftimate of greater and lefs, it was to be prefumed from the principles of human nature, and is found true in fact, that cabinets and parliaments are liable to vary from each other in opinion. What fyftem of religion or government has not in its turn been patronifed by national authority? The confequence therefore of admitting this authority is, not merely attributing to government a right to impofe fome, but any or all opinions upon the community. Are Paganifm and Chriftianity, the religions of * Book V, Chap. XXIII, p. 572.

Mahomet,

IN RELIGION AND GOVERNMENT.

Mahomet, Zoroafter and Confucius, are monarchy and ariftocracy in all their forms equally worthy to be perpetuated among mankind ? Is it quite certain that the greateft of all human calamities is change? Muft we never hope for any advance, any improvement? Have no revolution in government, and no reformation in religion been productive of more benefit than difadvantage? There is no fpecies of reafoning in defence of the fuppreffion of herefy which may not be brought back to this monftrous principle, that the knowlege of truth and the introduction of right principles of policy, are circumftances altogether indifferent to the welfare of mankind.

The fame reafonings that are here employed against the forcible Of erroneous fuppreffion of religious herefy, will be found equally valid with government. refrect to political. The first circumstance that will not fail to Iniquity of fuggeft itself to every reflecting mind, is, What fort of conftitu- refrain them. tion must that be which must never be examined ? whose excellencies must be the constant topic of eulogium, but respecting which we must never permit ourselves to enquire in what they confift ? Can it be the intereft of fociety to proferibe all inveftigation refpecting the wildom of its regulations? Or mult our debates be occupied with provisions of temporary convenience; and are we forbid to afk, whether there may not be fomething fundamentally wrong in the defign of the ftructure? Reafon and good fenfe will not fail to augur ill of that fyftem of things 4K 2 which opinions in the attempt to

BOOK VI. CHAP. III.

OF THE SUPPRESSION OF ERRONEOUS OPINIONS

BOOK VI. CHAP. III.

which is too facred to be looked into; and to fufpect that there must be fomething effentially weak that thus shrinks from the eve of curiofity. Add to which, that, however we may doubt of the importance of religious difputes, nothing can lefs reafonably be exposed to question than that the happiness of mankind is effentially connected with the improvement of political feience.

Tendency of unlimited political difcuffon.

" But will not demagogues and declaimers lead to the fubverfion of all order, and introduce the most dreadful calamities ?" What is the flate they will introduce? Monarchy and ariftocracy are fome of the most extensive and lasting mischiefs that have yet afflicted mankind. Will thefe demagogues perfuade their hearers to inftitute a new dynafty of hereditary defpots to opprefs them ? Will they perfuade them to create out of their ownbody a fet of feudal chiefs to hold their brethren in the moftbarbarous flavery? They would probably find the moft copiouseloquence inadequate to these purposes. The arguments of declaimers will not produce an extensive and ftriking alteration in political opinions, except fo far as they are built upon a bafis. of irrefiftible truth. Even if the people were in fome degree, intemperate in carrying the conclusions of these reasoners into, practice, the mifchiefs they would inflict would be inexpreffibly: trivial, compared with those which are hourly perpetrated by the most cold blooded despotism. But in reality the duty of government

620

IN RELIGION AND GOVERNMENT.

vernment in these cases is to be mild and equitable. Arguments alone will not have the power, unaffisted by the fense or the recollection of oppression or treachery, to hurry the people into excesses. Excesses are never the offspring of reason, are never the offspring of missing of missing of missing of missing to fisse reason and traverse the common fense of mankind. 621

BOOK VI. CHAP. III.

CHAP.

[ 622 ]

CHAP. IV.

OFTESTS.

THEIR SUPPOSED ADVANTAGES ARE ATTENDED WITH IN-JUSTICE — ARE NUGATORY. — ILLUSTRATION. — THEIR DISADVANTAGES — THEY ENSNARE. — EXAMPLE. — SE-COND EXAMPLE. — THEY ARE AN USURPATION. — INFLU-ENCE OF TESTS ON THE LATITUDINARIAN — ON THE PURIST. — CONCLUSION.

BOOK VI. CHAP. IV. HE majority of the arguments above employed on the fubject of penal laws in matters of opinion are equally applicable to tefts, religious and political. The diffunction between prizes and penalties, between greater and lefs, is little worthy of our attention, if any difcouragement extended to the curiofity of intellect, and any authoritative countenance afforded to one fet of opinions in preference to another, be in its own nature unjuft, and evidently hoftile to the general good.

> Leaving out of the confideration religious tefts, as being already fufficiently elucidated in the preceding difcuffion *, let us attend for a moment to an article which has had its advocates

> > * Chap. II.

among

TESTS. O F

among men of confiderable liberality, the fuppofed propriety of BOOK VI. CHAP. IV. political tefts. " What, fhall we have no federal oaths, no oaths of fidelity to the nation, the law and the republic ? How in that cafe shall we ever diffinguish between the enemies and the friends of freedom ?"

Certainly there cannot be a method devifed at once more inef- Their fupfectual and iniquitous than a federal oath. What is the lan- tages are atguage that in ftrictnefs of interpretation belongs to the act of the injulie: legiflature imposing this oath ? To one party it fays, " We know very well that you are our friends; the oath as it relates to you we acknowledge to be altogether fuperfluous; neverthelefs you must take it, as a cover to our indirect purposes in imposing it upon perfons whole views are lefs unequivocal than yours." To the other party it fays, " It is vehemently fufpected that you are inimical to the caufe in which we are engaged : this fufpicion is either true or falfe; if falfe, we ought not to fufpect you, and much lefs ought we to put you to this invidious and nugatory purgation; if true, you will either candidly confess your difference, or diffioneftly prevaricate : be candid, and we will indignantly banish you; be dishonest, and we will receive you as bofom friends."

Those who fay this however promise too much. Duty and are nuratory. common fenfe oblige us to watch the man we fufpect, even though he fhould fwear he is innocent. Would not the fame precautions pofed advantended with

BOOK VI.

624

precautions which we are fill obliged to employ to fecure us againft his duplicity, have fufficiently anfwered our purpofe without putting him to his purgation ? Are there no methods by which we can find out whether a man be the proper fubject in whom to repofe an important truft without putting the quefion to himfelf? Will not he, who is fo dangerous an enemy that we cannot fuffer him at large, difcover his enmity by his conduct, without reducing us to the painful neceffity of tempting him to an act of prevarication ? If he be fo fubtle a hypocrite that all our vigilance cannot detect him, will he fcruple to add to his other crimes the crime of perjury ?

Whether the teft we impose be merely intended to operate as an exclusion from office, or to any more confiderable difadvantage, the difability it introduces is ftill in the nature of a punishment. It treats the individual in queftion as an unfound member of fociety, as diftinguished in an unfavourable fense from the multitude of his countrymen, and posses for the eye of reason the multitude of his countrymen, and posses of reason human nature is capable of no other guilt than this*. Society is authorifed to animadvert upon a certain individual, in the case of murder for example, not because he has done an action that he might have avoided, not because he was fufficiently informed of the better and obstinately chose the worfe; for this is impossible, every man neceffarily does that which he at the time apprehends to be beft : but becaufe his habits and character render him dangerous to fociety, in the fame fenfe as a wolf or a blight would be dangerous *. It muft no doubt be an emergency of no common magnitude, that can juftify a people in putting a mark of difpleafure upon a man for the opinions he entertains, be they what they may. But, taking for granted for the prefent the reafonablenefs of this proceeding, it would certainly be juft as equitable for the government to adminifter to the man accufed for murder an oath of purgation, as to the man accufed of difaffection to the eftablifhed order of fociety. There cannot be a principle of juftice clearer than this, that no man can be called on in order to punifhment to accufe himfelf.

* Book IV, Chap. VI.

Thefe reafonings being particularly applicable to a people in Illuftration. a ftate of revolution like the French, it may perhaps be allowable to take from their revolution an example of the injurious and enfnaring effects with which tefts and oaths of fidelity are ufually attended. It was required of all men to fwear "that they would be faithful to the nation, the law and the king." In what fenfe can they be faid to have adhered to their oath, who, twelve months after their conftitution had been eftablifhed on its new bafis, have taken a fecond oath, declaratory of their everlafting abjuration of monarchy? What fort of effect, favourable or unfavourable ?

* Book IV, Chap. VI.

4 L

BOOK VI. favourable? must this precarious mutability in their folemn CHAP. IV. appeals to heaven have upon the minds of those by whom they are made?

And this leads us from the confideration of the fuppofed ad-Their difadvantages : vantages of tefts religious and political, to their real difadvantages. they enfnare: The first of these difadvantages confists in the impossibility of conftructing a teft in fuch a manner, as to fuit the various opinions of those upon whom it is imposed, and not to be liable to reafonable objection. When the law was repealed imposing example : upon the diffenting clergy of England a fubfcription with certain refervations to the articles of the eftablished church, an attempt was made to invent an unexceptionable teft that might be fubftituted in its room. This teft fimply affirmed, "that the books of the Old and New Testament in the opinion of the perfor. who took it contained a revelation from God;" and it was fuppofed that no Christian could fcruple fuch a declaration. But is it impoffible that I should be a Christian, and yet doubt of the canonical authority of the amatory eclogues of Solomon, or of certain other books contained in a felection that was originally made in a very arbitrary manner? "Still however I may take the teft, with a perfuafion that the books of the Old and New Teftament contain a revelation from God, and fomething more." In the fame fenfe I might take it, even if the Alcoran, the Talmud and the facred books of the Hindoos were added to the lift. What fort of influence will be produced upon the mind. 2 mind that is accultomed to this loofenefs of confiruction in its BOOK VI. moft folemn engagements?

Let us examine with the fame view the federal oath of the fecond example : French, proclaiming the determination of the fwearer "to be faithful to the nation, the law and the king." Fidelity to three feveral interefts which may in various cafes be placed in opposition to each other will appear at first fight to be no very reasonable engagement. The propriety of vowing fidelity to the king has already been brought to the trial and received its condemnation *. Fidelity to the law is an engagement of fo complicated a nature, as to strike terror into every mind of ferious reflection. It is impoffible that a fyftem of law the composition of men fhould ever be prefented to fuch a mind, that fhall appear altogether faultless. But, with respect to laws that appear to me to be unjust, I am bound to every fort of hostility short of open violence, I am bound to exert myfelf inceffantly in proportion to the magnitude of the injuffice for their abolition. Fidelity to the nation is an engagement fcarcely lefs equivocal. I have a paramount engagement to the caufe of juffice and the benefit of the human race. If the nation undertake what is unjust, fidelity in that undertaking is a crime. If it undertake what is juft, it is my duty to promote its fuccefs, not becaufe I am one of its citizens, but becaufe fuch is the command of justice.

BOOK VI. CHAP. IV. they are an ufurpation. Add to this what has been already faid upon the fubject of obedience *, and it will be fufficiently evident that all tefts are the offfpring of ufurpation. Government has in no cafe a right to iffue its commands, and therefore cannot command me to take a certain oath. Its only legal functions are, to impofe upon me a certain degree of reftraint whenever I manifeft by my actions a temper detrimental to the community, and to invite me to a certain contribution for purpofes conducive to the general intereft.

Influence of tefls on the latitudinarian : It may be alledged with refpect to the French federal oath, as well as with refpect to the religious teft before cited, that it may be taken with a certain laxity of interpretation. When I fwear fidelity to the law, I may mean only that there are certain parts of it that I approve. When I fwear fidelity to the nation, the law and the king, I may mean fo far only as thefe three authorities fhall agree with each other, and all of them agree with the general welfare of mankind. In a word the final refult of this laxity of interpretation explains the oath to mean, "I fwear that I believe it is my duty to do every thing that appears to me to be juft." Who can'look without indignation and regret at this profitution of language? Who can think without horror of the confequences of the public and perpetual leffon of duplicity which is thus read to mankind ?

on the purift.

But, fuppofing there should be certain members of the community

* Book III, Chap. VI.

munity fimple and uninftructed enough to conceive that an oath BOOK VI. contained fome real obligation, and did not leave the duty of the perfon to whom it was administered precifely where it found it, what is the leffon that would be read to fuch members? They would liften with horror to the man who endeavoured to perfuade them that they owed no fidelity to the nation, the law and the king, as to one who was infligating them to facrilege. They would tell him that it was too late, and that they muft not allow themfelves to hear his arguments. They would perhaps have heard enough before their alarm commenced, to make them look with envy on the happy flate of this man, who was free to liften to the communications of others without terror, who could give a loofe to his thoughts, and intrepidly follow the courfe of his enquiries wherever they led him. For themfelves they had promifed to think no more for the reft of their Compliance indeed in this cafe is impoffible; but will a lives. vow of inviolable adherence to a certain conflitution have no effect in checking the vigour of their contemplations and the elafticity of their minds?

We put a miferable deception upon ourfelves, when we Conclution. promife ourfelves the most favourable effects from the abolition of monarchy and aristocracy, and retain this wretched fystem of tests, overturning in the apprehensions of mankind at large the fundamental distinctions of justice and injustice. Sincerity is not less effential than equality to the well being of mankind. S A govern-

629

BOOK VI. A government, that is perpetually furnifhing motives to jefu-CHAP. IV. itifin and hypocrify, is not lefs abhorrent to right reafon, than a government of orders and hereditary diffinction. It is not eafy government of orders and hereditary diffunction. It is not easy to imagine how foon men would become frank, explicit in their declarations, and unreferved in their manners, were there no politive inftitutions inculcating upon them the neceffity of falfhood and difguife. Nor is it poffible for any language to defcribe the inexhauftible benefits that would arife from the uniwerfal practice of fincerity,

[ 631 ]

CHAP. V.

OF OATHS.

OATHS OF OFFICE AND DUTY — THEIR ABSURDITY — THEIR IMMORAL CONSEQUENCES.—OATHS OF EVIDENCE LESS ATROCIOUS.—OPINION OF THE LIBERAL AND RESOL-VED RESPECTING THEM.—THEIR ESSENTIAL FEATURES: CONFEMPT OF VERACITY — FALSE MORALITY.—THEIR PARTICULAR STRUCTURE—ABSTRACT PRINCIPLES AS-SUMED BY THEM TO BE TRUE—THEIR INCONSISTENCY WITH THESE PRINCIPLES.

THE fame arguments that prove the injuffice of tefts, may be applied univerfally to all oaths of duty and office. If I entered upon the office without an oath, what would be my duty? Can the oath that is impofed upon me make any alteration in my duty? If not, does not the very act of impofing it, by implication affert a falfhood? Will this falfhood, the affertion that a direct engagement has a tendency to create a duty, have no injurious effect upon a majority of the perfons concerned? What is the true criterion that I fhall faithfully difcharge the office that is conferred upon me? Surely my paft life, and not any proteftations I may be compelled to make. If my life have been

BOOK VI. CHAP. V.

Oaths of office and duty : their abfurdity :

OF OATHS.

BOOK VI. been unimpeachable, this compulsion is an unmerited infult; if CHAP. V. it have been otherwife, it is fomething worfe.

their immoral confequences.

It is with no common disapprobation that we recollect the proftitution of oaths which marks the hiftory of modern European countries, and particularly of our own. This is one of the means that government employs to difcharge itfelf of its proper functions, by making each man fecurity for himfelf. It is one of the means that legiflators have provided to cover the inefficiency and abfurdity of their regulations, by making individuals promife the execution of that which the police is not able to It holds out in one hand the temptation to do wrong, execute. and in the other the obligation imposed not to be influenced by that temptation. It compels a man to engage not only for his own conduct, but for that of all his dependents. It obliges certain officers (church-wardens in particular) to promife an infpection beyond the limits of human faculties, and to engage for a proceeding on the part of those under their jurifdiction. which they neither intend nor are expected to inforce. Will it be believed in after ages that every confiderable trader in excifeable articles in this country is induced by the conftitution of its government to reconcile his mind to the guilt of perjury, as to the condition upon which he is accuftomed to exercife his profession ?

Oaths of evidence: lefs atrocious. Which have found their advocates among perfons fufficiently enlightened lightened to reject every other fpecies of oath, I mean, oaths administered to a witness in a court of justice. These are certainly free from many of the objections that apply to oaths of fidelity. duty or office. They do not call upon a man to declare his affent to a certain proposition which the legislator has prepared for his acceptance; they only require him folemnly to pledge himfelf to the truth of affertions, dictated by his own apprehenfion of things. and expressed in his own words. They do not require him to engage for fomething future, and of confequence to thut up his mind against farther information as to what his conduct in that future ought to be; but merely to pledge his veracity to the apprehended order of things paft.

632

OF OATHS.

These confiderations palliate the evil, but do not convert it into Opinion of good. Wherever men of uncommon energy and dignity of mind and refolved have exifted, they have felt the degradation of binding their affer- them. tions with an oath. The English conflitution recognises in a partial and imperfect manner the force of this principle, and therefore provides that, while the common herd of mankind shall be obliged to fwear to the truth, nothing more shall be required from the order of nobles than a declaration upon honour. Will reafon justify this diffinction?

Can there be a practice more pregnant with falfe morality than Their effenthat of administering oaths in a court of justice? The language it contempt of expressly holds is, " You are not to be believed upon your mere tial features : veracity :

word ;"

the liberal respecting

BOOK VI. CHAP. V.

OF OATHS.

BOOK VI. CHAP. V.

634

word;" and there are few men firm enough refolutely to preferve themfelves from contamination, when they are accuftomed upon the moft folemn occafions to be treated with contempt. To the unthinking it comes like a plenary indulgence to the occafional tampering with veracity in affairs of daily occurrence, that they are not upon their oath; and we may affirm without rifk of error, that there is no caufe of infincerity, prevarication and falfhood more powerful, than the practice of administering oaths in a court of juffice. It treats veracity in the affairs of common life as a thing unworthy to be regarded. It takes for granted that no man, at leaft no man of plebeian rank, is to be credited upon his bare affirmation; and what it takes for granted it has an irrefisible tendency to produce.

falle morality. Add to this a feature that runs through all the abufes of political inflitution, it inverts the eternal principles of morality. Why is it that I am bound to be more efpecially careful of what I affirm in a court of juffice? Becaufe the fubfiftence, the honeft reputation or the life of a fellow man may be materially affected by it. All thefe genuine motives are by the contrivance of human inflitution thrown into fhade, and we are expected to fpeak the truth, only becaufe government demands it of us upon oath, and at the times in which government has thought proper or recollected to adminifter this oath. All attempts to firengthen the obligations of morality by fictitious and fpurious motives, will in the fequel be found to have no tendency but to relax them.

Men

Men will never act with that liberal juffice and confcious integrity which is their higheft ornament, till they come to underfand what men are. He that contaminates his lips with an oath, muft have been thoroughly fortified with previous moral inftruction, if he be able afterwards to understand the beauty of an eafy and fimple integrity. If our political inflitutors had been but half fo judicious in perceiving the manner in which excellence and worth were to be generated, as they have been ingenious and indefatigable in the means of depraving mankind, the world, inftead of a flaughter houfe, would have been a paradife.

Let us leave for a moment the general confideration of the Their partiprinciple of oaths, to reflect upon their particular ftructure and ture: the precife meaning of the term. They take for granted in the ciples affumed first place the existence of an invisible governor of the world, and true: the propriety of our addreffing petitions to him, both which a man may deny, and yet continue a good member of fociety. What is the fituation in which the inflitution of which we treat places this man? But we must not fuffer ourfelves to be flopped by trivial confiderations.-Oaths are also fo conftructed as to take for granted the religious fyftem of the country whatever it may happen to be,

Now what are the words with which we are taught in this in- their inconftance to address the creator of the universe? " So help me God, thefe prinand the contents of his holy word." It is the language of imfiftency with ciples.

precation.

cular ftrucabitract prinby them to be

POOK VI. CHAP. V.

4 M 2

OF OATHS.

BOOK VI. precation. I pray him to pour down his everlafting wrath and CHAP. V. curfe upon me, if I utter a lie.—It were to be wifhed that the name of that man were recorded, who first invented this mode of binding men to veracity. He had furely himfelf but very light and contemptuous notions of the Supreme Being, who could thus tempt men to infult him, by braving his justice. If it be our duty to invoke his bleffing, yet there must furely be fomething infupportably profane in wantonly and unneceffarily putting all that he is able to inflict upon us upon conditions.

[ 637 ]

CHAP. VI.

OF LIBELS.

PUBLIC LIBELS.—INJUSTICE OF AN ATTEMPT TO PRESCRIBE THE METHOD IN WHICH PUBLIC QUESTIONS SHALL BE DISCUSSED — ITS PUSILLANIMITY. — INVITATIONS TO TUMULT.—PRIVATE LIBELS.—REASONS IN FAVOUR OF THEIR BEING SUBJECTED TO RESTRAINT.—ANSWER.— I. IT IS NECESSARY THE TRUTH SHOULD BE TOLD.—SA-LUTARY EFFECTS OF THE UNRESTRAINED INVESTIGA-TION OF CHARACTER. — OBJECTION: FREEDOM OF SPEECH WOULD BE PRODUCTIVE OF CALUMNY, NOT OF JUSTICE.—ANSWER.—FUTURE HISTORY OF LIBEL.—2. IT IS NECESSARY MEN SHOULD BE TAUGHT TO BE SINCERE. —EXTENT OF THE EVIL WHICH ARISES FROM A COM-MAND TO BE INSINCERE.—THE MIND SPONTANEOUSLY SHRINKS FROM THE PROSECUTION OF A LIBEL.—CON-CLUSION.

I N the examination already befowed upon the article of herefy political and religious *, we have anticipated one of the two heads of the law of libel; and, if the arguments there adduced be admitted for valid, it will follow that no punifhment can juffly

BOOK VI. CHAP. VI. Public libele.

* Chap. III.

be

BOOK VI. be awarded against any writing or words derogatory to religion CHAP. VI. or political government.

Injuffice of an attempt to preferibe the method in which public queftions fhall be difeuffed :

It is impoffible to eftablish any folid ground of diffinction upon this fubject, or to lay down rules in conformity to which the argument must be treated. It is impossible to tell me, when I am penetrated with the magnitude of the fubject, that I must be logical and not eloquent; or when I feel the abfurdity of the theory I am combating, that I muft not express it in terms that may produce feelings of ridicule in my readers. It were better to forbid me the difcuffion of the fubject altogether, than forbid me to defcribe it in the manner I conceive to be most fuitable to its merits. It would be a most tyrannical species of candour to tell me, " You may write against the fystem we patronife, provided you will write in an imbecil and ineffectual manner; you may enquire and inveftigate as much as you pleafe, provided, when you undertake to communicate the refult, you carefully check your ardour, and be upon your guard that you do not convey any of your own feelings to your readers." Add to this, that rules of diffinction, as they are abfurd in relation to the diffidents, will prove a continual inftrument of ufurpation and injuffice to the ruling party. No reafonings will appear fair to them, but fuch If I fpeak with energy, they will deem me inflamas are futile. matory; and if I defcribe cenfurable proceedings in plain and homely, but pointed language, they will cry out upon me as a buffoon.

It

It must be truly a lamentable cafe, if truth, favoured by the many and patronifed by the great, fhould prove too weak to enter the lifts with falfhood. It is felf evident, that that which will ftand the teft of examination, cannot need the fupport of penal ftatutes. After our adverfaries have exhausted their eloquence and exerted themfelves to miflead us, truth has a clear, nervous and fimple ftory to tell, which, if force be excluded on all fides, will not fail to put down their arts. Mifreprefentation will fpeedily vanish, if the friends of truth be but half as alert as the advocates of falfhood. Surely then it is a most ungracious plea to offer, " We are too idle to reason with you, we are therefore determined to filence you by force." So long as the adverfaries of juffice confine themfelves to expoftulation, there can be no ground for ferious alarm. As foon as they begin to act with violence and riot, it will then be time enough to encounter them with force.

There is however one particular clafs of libel that feems to demand a feparate confideration. A libel may either not confine itfelf to any fpecies of illustration of religion or government, or it may leave illustration entirely out of its view. Its object may be to invite a multitude of perfons to affemble, as the first step towards acts of violence. A public libel is any species of writing in which the wisdom of some established system is controverted; and it cannot be denied that a dispassionate and fevere demonstration of its injustice tends, not lefs than the most alarming tumult, BOOK VI. CHAP. VI. its pufillanimity.

Invitations to tumult.

BOOK VI. CHAP. VI.

640 to the deftruction of fuch inftitutions. But writing and fpeech are the proper and becoming methods of operating changes in human fociety, and tumult is an improper and equivocal method. In the cafe then of the fpecific preparations of riot, it fhould feem . that the regular force of the fociety may lawfully interfere. But this interference may be of two kinds. It may confift of precautions to counteract all tumultuous concourfe, or it may arraign the individual for the offence he has committed against the peace of the community. The first of these seems fufficiently commendable and wife, and would, if vigilantly exerted, be in almost all cafes adequate to the purpose. The fecond is attended with fome difficulty. A libel the avowed intention of which is to lead to immediate violence, is altogether different from a publication in which the general merits of any inflitution are treated with the utmost freedom, and may well be fupposed to fall under different rules. The difficulty here arifes only from the confideration of the general nature of punifhment, which is abhorrent to the true principles of mind, and ought to be reftrained within as narrow limits as poffible, if not inftantly abolifhed *. A diftinction to which observation and experience in cases of judicial proceeding have uniformly led, is that between crimes that exift only in intention, and overt acts. So far as prevention only is concerned, the former would feem in many cafes not lefs entitled to the animadversion of fociety than the latter; but the evidence of intention ufually refts upon circumstances equivocal and minute,

* See the following Book.

6

nute, and the friend of juffice will tremble to erect any grave proceeding upon fo uncertain a bafis.----It might be added, that he who favs that every honeft citizen of London ought to repair to St. George's Fields to-morrow in arms, only fays what he thinks is beft to be done, and what the laws of fincerity oblige him to But this argument is of a general nature, and applies to utter. every thing that is denominated crime, not to the fuppofed crime of inflammatory invitations in particular. He that performs any action, does that which he thinks is beft to be done; and, if the peace of fociety make it neceffary that he should be restrained from this by threats of violence, the neceffity is of a very painful nature. ----- It fhould be remembered that the whole of thefe reafonings fuppofe that the tumult is an evil, and will produce more difadvantage than benefit, which is no doubt frequently, but may not be always, the cafe. It cannot be too often recollected, that there is in no cafe a right of doing wrong, a right to punish for a meritorious action. Every government, as well as every individual, must follow their own apprehensions of justice, at the peril of being miltaken, unjuft and confequently vicious* .- Thefe reafonings on exhortations to tumult, will also be found applicable with flight variation to incendiary letters addreffed to private perfons.

But the law of libel, as we have already faid, diffributes itfelf Private libels. into two heads, libels against public establishments and measures. and libels against private character. Those who have been willing

CHAP. VI.

to

∢

* Book II, Chap. III. 4 N

BOOK VI.

to admit that the first ought to pass unpunished, have generally afferted the propriety of counteracting the latter by censures and penalties. It shall be the business of the remainder of this chapter to show that they were erroneous in their decision.

Reafons in favour of their being fubjected to retraint.

The arguments upon which their decifion is built must be allowed to be both popular and impreffive. " There is no external poffeffion more folid or more valuable than an honeft fame. My property, in goods or eftate, is appropriated only by conven-Its value is for the most part the creature of a debauched tion. imagination; and, if I were fufficiently wife and philosophical, he that deprived me of it would do me very little injury. He that inflicts a ftab upon my character is a much more formidable enemy. It is a very ferious inconvenience that my countrymen fhould regard me as defitute of principle and honefty. If the mifchief were entirely to myfelf, it is not poffible to be regarded with levity. I must be void of all fense of justice, if I were callous to the contempt and deteftation of the world. I must ceafe to be a man, if I were unaffected by the calumny that deprived me of the friend I loved, and left me perhaps without one bosom in which to repofe my fympathies. But this is not all. The fame ftroke that annihilates my character, extremely abridges, if it do not annihilate, my usefulness. It is in vain that I would exert my good intentions and my talents for the affiftance of others, if my motives be perpetually mifinterpreted. Men will not liften to the arguments of him they defpife; he will be fpurned 5 fourned during life, and execrated as long as his memory endures. BOOK VI. CHAP. What then are we to conclude but that to an injury, greater than robbery, greater perhaps than murder, we ought to award an exemplary punifhment ?"

The answer to this flatement may be given in the form of an Answer. illustration of two propositions : first, that it is necessary the truth should be told; fecondly, that it is neceffary men should be taught to be fincere.

First, it is necessary the truth should be told. How can this 1. It is neever be done, if I be forbidden to fpeak upon more than one fide truth fhould of the question? The cafe is here exactly fimilar to the cafe of religion and political eftablishment. If we must always hear the praife of things as they are, and allow no man to urge an objection, we may be lulled into torpid tranquillity, but we can never be wife.

If a veil of partial favour is to be drawn over the errors of mankind, it is eafy to perceive whether virtue or vice will be the gainer. There is no terror that comes home to the heart of vice, like the terror of being exhibited to the public eye. On the contrary there is no reward worthy to be beftowed upon eminent virtue but this one, the plain, unvarnished proclamation of its excellence in the face of the world.

BOOK VI. CHAP.VI.

644

Salutary effects of the unreftrained inveftigation of character. If the unreftrained difcuffion of abftract enquiry be of the higheft importance to mankind, the unreftrained inveftigation of character is fcarcely lefs to be cultivated. If truth were univerfally told of men's difpositions and actions, gibbets and wheels might be difmiffed from the face of the earth. The knave unmasked would be obliged to turn honeft in his own defence. Nay, no man would have time to grow a knave. Truth would follow him in his first irrefolute essay, and public difapprobation arreft him in the commencement of his career.

There are many men at prefent who pass for virtuous, that tremble at the boldness of a project like this. They would be detected in their effeminacy and imbecility. Their imbecility is the growth of that inaufpicious fecrecy, which national manners and political inflitutions at prefent draw over the actions of individuals. If truth were fpoken without referve, there would be no fuch men in existence. Men would act with clearness and decifion, if they had no hopes in concealment, if they faw at every turn that the eye of the world was upon them. How great would be the magnanimity of the man who was always fure to be observed, fure to be judged with difcernment, and to be treated with juffice ? Feebleness of character would hourly lofe its influence in the breaft of those over whom it now domineers. They would feel themfelves perpetually urged with an aufpicious violence to affume manners more worthy of the form they bore.

4

To

To these reasonings it may perhaps be rejoined, "This indeed BOOK VI. is an interefting picture. If truth could be univerfally told, the effects would no doubt be of the moft excellent nature; but the expectation is to be regarded as vifionary."

CHAP. VI. Objection : freedom of fpeech would be productive. of calumny, not of juffice.

Not fo: the difcovery of individual and perfonal truth is to be Anfwer. effected in the fame manner as the difcovery of general truth, by difcuffion. From the collifion of difagreeing accounts juffice and reafon will be produced. Mankind feldom think much of any particular fubject, without coming to think right at laft.

"What, and is it to be fuppofed, that mankind will have the difcernment and the juffice of their own accord to reject the libel ?" Yes; libels do not at prefent deceive mankind, from their intrinsic power, but from the reftraint under which they The man who from his dungeon is brought to the labour. light of day, cannot accurately diffinguish colours; but he that has fuffered no confinement, feels no difficulty in the operation. Such is the ftate of mankind at prefent : they are not exercifed to employ their judgment, and therefore they are deficient in judgment. The most improbable tale now makes a deep impreffion; but then men would be accuftomed to fpeculate upon the poffibilities of human action.

At first it may be, if all restraint upon the freedom of writing Future hifand fpeech were removed, and men were encouraged to declare tory of libel;

BOOK VI. CHAP. VI. what they thought as publicly as poffible, every prefs would be burdened with an inundation of fcandal. But the ftories by their very multiplicity would defeat themfelves. No one man, if the lie were fuccefsful, would become the object of univerfal perfecution. In a fhort time the reader, accuftomed to the diffection of character, would acquire difcrimination. He would either detect the impofition by its internal abfurdity, or at leaft would attribute to the ftory no farther weight, than that to which its evidence entitled it.

Libel, like every other human concern, would foon find its level, if it were delivered from the injurious interference of political inftitution. The libeller, that is, he who utters an unfounded calumny, either invents the ftory he tells, or delivers it with a degree of affurance to which the evidence that has offered itself to him is by no means entitled. In each cafe he would meet with his proper punifhment in the judgment of the The confequences of his error would fall back upon world. He would either pass for a malignant accuser, or for himfelf. a rafh and headlong cenfurer. Anonymous fcandal would be almost impossible in a state where nothing was concealed. But. if it were attempted, it would be wholly pointlefs, fince, where there could be no honeft and rational excuse for concealment. the defire to be concealed would prove the bafeness of the motive.

Secondly,

Secondly, force ought not to intervene for the suppression of private libels, becaufe men ought to learn to be fincere. There is no branch of virtue more effential than that which confifts in giving language to our thoughts. He that is accuftomed to utter what he knows to be false or to suppress what he knows to be true, is in a perpetual flate of degradation. If I have had particular opportunity to obferve any man's vices, juffice will not fail to fuggeft to me that I ought to admonifh him of his errors, and to warn those whom his errors might injure. There may be very fufficient ground for my reprefenting him as a vicious man, though I may be totally unable to establish his vices to as to make him a proper fubject of judicial punifhment. Nay, it cannot be otherwife; for I ought to defcribe his character exactly fuch as it appears to be, whether it be virtuous, or vicious, or of an ambiguous nature. Ambiguity would prefently cease, if every man avowed his fentiments. It is here as in the intercourfes of friendship: a timely explanation feldom fails to heal a broil ; mifunderstandings would not grow confiderable. were we not in the habit of brooding over imaginary wrongs.

Laws for the suppression of private libels are properly speaking Extent of the laws to reftrain men from the practice of fincerity. They create arifes from a warfare between the genuine dictates of unbiaffed private judg- to be infinment and the apparent fenfe of the community, throwing obfcurity upon the principles of virtue, and infpiring an indifference to the practice. This is one of those confequences of political

BOOK VI. CHAP. VI.

2. It is neceffary men fhould be taught to be fincere.

evil which a command cere.

BOOK VI. CHAP. VI.

64.3

political inftitution that prefents itfelf at every moment : morality is rendered the victim of uncertainty and doubt. Contradictory fyftems of conduct contend with each other for the preference, and I become indifferent to them all. How is it poffible that I fhould imbibe the divine enthufiafm of benevolence and juffice, when I am prevented from difcerning what it is in which they confift ? Other laws affume for the topic of their animadvertion actions of unfrequent occurrence. But the law of libels uturps the office of directing me in my daily duties, and, by perpetually menacing me with the fcourge of punifhment, undertakes to render me habitually a coward, continually governed by the bafeft and moft unprincipled motives.

Courage confifts more in this circumftance than in any other, the daring to fpeak every thing, the uttering of which may conduce to good. Actions, the performance of which requires an inflexible refolution, call upon us but feldom; but the virtuous economy of fpeech is our perpetual affair. Every moralift can tell us that morality eminently confifts in "the government of the tongue." But this branch of morality has long been inverted. Inftead of fludying what we fhall tell, we are taught to confider what we fhall conceal. Inftead of an active virtue, "going about doing good," we are inftructed to believe that the chief end of man is to do no mifchief. Inftead of fortitude, we are carefully imbued with maxims of artifice and cunning, mifnamed prudence.

Let

Let us contrast the character of those men with whom we are accustomed to converse, with the character of men fuch as they ought to be, and will be. On the one fide we perceive a perpetual caution, that fhrinks from the obferving eye, that conceals with a thousand folds the genuine emotions of the heart. and that renders us unwilling to approach the men that we fuppole accuftomed to read it, and to tell what they read. Such characters as ours are the mere fhadows of men, with a fpecious outfide perhaps, but defitute of fubftance and foul. Oh, when fhall we arrive at the land of realities, when men fhall be known for what they are, by energy of thought and intrepidity of action ! It is fortitude, that must render a man fuperior alike to careffes and threats, enable him to derive his happiness from within, and accuftom him to be upon all occasions prompt to affift and to inform. Every thing therefore favourable to fortitude muft be of ineftimable value; every thing that inculcates diffimulation worthy of our perpetual abhorrence.

There is one thing more that is of importance to be observed The mind upon this fubject of libel, which is, the good effects that would farinks from fpring from every man's being accuftomed to encounter falfhood tion of a libel. with its only proper antidote, truth. After all the arguments that have been industriously accumulated to justify profecution for libel, every man that will retire into himfelf, will feel himfelf convinced of their infufficiency. The modes in which an innocent and a guilty man would repel an accufation against the profecu-

them

40

BOOK VI. CHAP. VI.

BOOK VI. CHAP. VI. CHAP. VI. them might be expected to be oppofite; but the law of libel confounds them. He that was confcious of his rectitude, and undebauched by ill fyftems of government, would fay to his adverfary, "Publifh what you pleafe againft me, I have truth on my fide, and will confound your mifreprefentations." His fenfe of fitnefs and juftice would not permit him to fay, "I will have recourfe to the only means that are congenial to guilt, I will compel you to be filent." A man, urged by indignation and impatience, may commence a profecution againft his accufer; but he may be affured, the world, that is a difinterefted fpectator, feels no cordiality for his proceedings. The language of their fentiments upon fuch occafions is, "What! he dares not even let us hear what can be faid againft him."

Conclution. The arguments in favour of juffice, however different may be the views under which it is confidered, perpetually run parallel to each other. The recommendations under this head are precifely the fame as those under the preceding, the generation of activity and fortitude. The tendency of all falle fystems of political inftitution is to render the mind lethargic and torpid. Were we accustomed not to recur either to public or individual force but upon occasions that unequivocally justified their employment, we should then come to have fome respect for reason, for we should know its power. How great must be the difference between him who answers me with a writ of fummons or a challenge, and him who employs the fword and the shield of truth alone? He knows that force only is to be encountered BOOK VI. with force, and allegation with allegation; and he forms to change places with the offender by being the first to break the peace. He does that which, were it not for the degenerate habits of fociety, would fcarcely deferve the name of courage, dares to meet upon equal ground, with the facred armour of truth, an adverfary who poffeffes only the perifhable weapons of falfhood. He calls up his underftanding; and does not defpair of baffling the shallow pretences of calumny. He calls up his firmnefs; and knows that a plain ftory, every word of which is marked with the emphasis of fincerity, will carry conviction to every hearer. It were abfurd to expect that truth fhould be cultivated, fo long as we are accuftomed to believe that it is an impotent incumbrance. It would be impoffible to neglect it, if we knew that it was as impenetrable as adamant, and as lafting as the world.

3

of

CHAP. VI.

[ 652 ]

CHAP. VII.

OF CONSTITUTIONS.

DISTINCTION OF REGULATIONS CONSTITUENT AND LE-GISLATIVE. — SUPPOSED CHARACTER OF PERMANENCE THAT OUGHT TO BE GIVEN TO THE FORMER—INCON-SISTENT WITH THE NATURE OF MAN.—SOURCE OF THE ERROR.—REMARK.—ABSURDITY OF THE SYSTEM OF PERMANENCE.—ITS FUTILITY.—MODE TO BE PURSUED IN FRAMING A CONSTITUTION.—CONSTITUENT LAWS. NOT MORE IMPORTANT THAN OTHERS. — IN WHAT MANNER THE CONSENT OF THE DISTRICTS IS TO BE DECLARED. — TENDENCY OF THE PRINCIPLE WHICH RE-QUIRES THIS CONSENT.—IT WOULD REDUCE THE NUM-BER OF CONSTITUTIONAL ARTICLES—PARCEL OUT THE LEGISLATIVE FOWER — AND PRODUCE THE GRADUAL EXTINCTION OF LAW.—OBJECTION.—ANSWER.

BOOK VI. CHAP. VII.

Diffinction of regulations conflituent and legiflative. A N article intimately connected with the political confideration of opinion is fuggefted to us by a doctrine which has lately been taught relatively to conflict on the seen faid that the laws of every regular flate naturally diffribute themfelves under two heads, fundamental and adfcititious; laws, the object object of which is the diffribution of political power and BOOK VI. directing the permanent forms according to which public bufinefs is to be conducted; and laws, the refult of the deliberations of powers already conflituted. This diffinction being eftablished Supposed in the first instance, it has been inferred, that these laws are of permanence very unequal importance, and that of confequence those of the first class ought to be originated with much greater folemnity, and to be declared much lefs fufceptible of variation than those of the fecond. The French national affembly of 1780 pushed this principle to the greateft extremity, and feemed defirous of providing every imaginable fecurity for rendering the work they had formed immortal. It could not be touched upon any account under the term of ten years; every alteration it was to receive must be recognifed as necessary by two fuccessive national affemblies of the ordinary kind ; after these formalities an affem-bly of revision was to be elected, and they to be forbidden to touch the conftitution in any other points than those which had been previoully marked out for their confideration.

It is easy to perceive that these precautions are in direct hosti- inconfistent lity with the principles established in this work. "Man and for ture of man. ever !" was the motto of the labours of this affembly. Tuft broken loofe from the thick darkness of an absolute monarchy, they affumed to prefcribe leffons of wifdom to all future ages. They feem not fo much as to have dreamed of that purification. of intellect, that climax of improvement, which may very pro-2 bably.

CHAP. VIL

653 character of that ought to be given to the former :

with the na-

BOOK VI. CHAP.VII.

bably be the definy of pofterity. The true ftate of man, as has been already demonstrated, is, not to have his opinions bound down in the fetters of an eternal quietifm, but flexible and unreftrained to yield with facility to the imprefisions of increasing truth. That form of fociety will appear most perfect to an enlightened mind, which is least founded in a principle of permanence. But, if this view of the fubject be just, the idea of giving permanence to what is called the constitution of any government, and rendering one class of laws, under the appellation of fundamental, less fusceptible of change than another, must be founded in misapprehension and error.

Source of the error.

The error probably originally fprung out of the forms of political monopoly which we fee eftablished over the whole civilised Government could not juftly derive in the first instance world. but from the choice of the people; or, to fpeak more accurately (for the former principle, however popular and fpecious, is in reality falfe), government ought to be adjusted in its provisions to the prevailing apprehenfions of justice and truth. But we fee government at prefent administered either in whole or in part by a king and a body of nobleffe; and we reafonably fay that the laws made by thefe authorities are one thing, and the laws from which they derived their existence another. But we do not confider that these authorities, however originated, are in their own nature unjuft. If we had never feen arbitrary and capricious forms of government, we fhould probably never have have thought of cutting off certain laws from the code under the name of conflitutional. When we behold certain individuals or bodies of men exercifing an exclusive fuperintendence over the affairs of a nation, we inevitably afk how they came by their authority, and the anfwer is, By the conflitution. But, if we faw no power exifting in the ftate but that of the people, having a body of reprefentatives, and a certain number of official fecretaries and clerks acting in their behalf, fubject to their revifal, and renewable at their pleafure, the queftion, how the people came by this authority, would never have fuggefted itfelf.

A celebrated objection that has been urged against the govern- Remarkments of modern Europe is that they have no conflictions *. If by this objection it be understood, that they have no written code bearing this appellation, and that their conflictions have been lefs an instantaneous than a gradual production, the criticisin feems to be rather verbal, than of effential moment. In any other fense it is to be fuspected that the remark would amount to an eulogium, but an eulogium to which they are certainly by no means entitled.

But to return to the queftion of permanence. Whether we Abfuklity of the fyltem of admit or reject the diffinction between conflitutional and ordi-permanence. nary legiflation, it is not lefs true that the power of a people * Rights of Man.

655

to EOOK VI. to change their confliction morally confidered, must be firicily CHAP. VII. and univerfally coeval with the existence of a constitution.

The language of permanence in this cafe is the greateft of all abfurdities. It is to fay to a nation, "Are you convinced that fomething is right, perhaps immediately neceffary, to be done? It fhall be done ten years hence."

The folly of this fyftem may be farther elucidated, if farther elucidation be neceffary, from the following dilemma. Either a people muft be governed according to their own apprehenfions of juffice and truth, or they muft not. The laft of thefe affertions cannot be avowed, but upon the unequivocal principles of tyranny. But, if the firft be true, then it is juft as abfurd to fay to a nation, This government, which you chofe nine years ago, is the legitimate government, and the government which your prefent fentiments approve the illegitimate ; as to infift upon their being governed by the dista of their remoteft anceftors, or even of the moft infolent ufurper.

Its futility.

It is extremely probable that a national affembly chofen in the ordinary forms, is just as much empowered to change the fundamental laws, as to change any of the least important branches of legislation. This function would never perhaps be dangerous but in a country that still preferved a portion of monarchy or aristocracy, and in such a country a principle of permanence would be found a very feeble antidote against the danger. The true

true principle upon the fubject is, that no affembly, though BOOK VI. chofen with the most unexampled folemnity, has a power to impofe any regulations contrary to the public apprehension of right; and a very ordinary authority, fairly originated, will be fufficient to facilitate the harmonious adoption of a change that is dictated by national opinion. The diffinction of conftitutional and ordinary topics will always appear in practice unintelligible and vexatious. The affemblies of more frequent recurrence will find themfelves arrefted in the intention of conferring any eminent benefit on their country, by the apprehension that they fhall invade the conflitution. In a country where the people are habituated to fentiments of equality and where no political monopoly is tolerated, there is little danger that any national affembly fhould be difpofed to inforce a pernicious change, and there is still less that the people should submit to the injury, or not poffefs the means eafily and with fmall interruption of public tranquillity to avert it. The language of reafon on this fubject is, "Give us equality and juffice, but no conflitution. Suffer us to follow without reftraint the dictates of our own judgment, and to change our forms of focial order as fast as we improve in underftanding and knowledge,"

The opinion upon this head most popular in France at the Mode to be time that the national convention entered upon its functions, framing a was that the bufinefs of the convention extended only to the prefenting a draught of a conftitution, to be fubmitted in the purfued in conflitution.

fequel

СНАР.

4 P

BOOK V1. fequel to the approbation of the diffricts, and then only to be CHAP. V11. confidered as law. This opinion is well deferving of a ferious examination.

Conflituent laws not more important than others.

The first idea that fuggests itself respecting it is, that, if conftitutional laws ought to be fubjected to the revision of the diffricts, then all laws ought to undergo the fame procefs, underftanding by laws all declarations of a general principle to be applied to particular cafes as they may happen to occur, and even including all provisions for individual emergencies that will admit of the delay incident to the revision in question. It is an egregious miftake to imagine that the importance of these articles. is in a defcending ratio from fundamental to ordinary, and from ordinary to particular. It is poffible for the moft odious injuffice to be perpetrated by the beft conftituted affembly. A law rendering it capital to oppofe the doctrine of transubftantiation, would be more injurious to the public welfare, than a law changing the duration of the national reprefentative, from two years, to one year or to three. Taxation has been flown to be an article rather of executive than legiflative administration *; and yet a very oppreffive and unequal tax would be fcarcely lefs ruinous than any fingle meafure that could poffibly be devifed.

In what manner the confent of the diffricts to certain conflictuational articles, whether more be declared.

* Book V, Chap. I.

CONSTITUTIONS. OF.

or lefs numerous, will be either real or delufive according to the mode adopted for that purpole. If the diffricts be required to decide upon these articles by a fimple affirmative or negative, it will then be delufive. It is impofible for any man or body of men, in the due exercise of their understanding, to decide upon any complicated fyftem in that manner. It can fcarcely happen but that there will be fome things that they will. approve and fome that they will difapprove. On the other hand, if the articles be unlimitedly propofed for difcuffion in the diffricts. a transaction will be begun to which it is not easy to forefee a termination. Some diffricts will object to certain articles: and. if thefe articles be modelled to obtain their approbation, it is poffible that the very alteration introduced to pleafe one part of the community, may render the code lefs acceptable to another. How are we to be affured that the diffidents will not fet up a feparate government for themfelves? The reafons that might be offered to perfuade a minority of diffricts to yield to the fenfe of a majority, are by no means fo perfpicuous and forcible, as those which fometimes perfuade the minority of members in a given affembly to that fpecies of conceffion.

It is defirable in all cafes of the practical adoption of any Tendency of given principle, that we fould fully understand the meaning of which rethe principle, and perceive the conclusions to which it inevitably confent. This principle of a confent of diffricts has an immediate leads. tendency, by a falutary gradation perhaps, to lead to the diffo-

the principle quires this

659

4P 2

lution .

BOOK VI. CHAP. VII. lution of all government. What then can be more abfurd, than to fee it embraced by thofe very men, who are at the fame time advocates for the complete legiflative unity of a great empire? It is founded upon the fame bafis as the principle of private judgment, which it is to be hoped will fpeedily fuperfede the poffibility of the action of fociety in a collective capacity. It is defirable that the moft important acts of the national reprefentatives fhould be fubject to the approbation or rejection of the diftricts whofe reprefentatives they are, for exactly the fame reafon as it is defirable, that the acts of the diftricts themfelves fhould, as fpeedily as practicability will admit, be in force only fo far as relates to the individuals by whom thofe acts are approved.

It would reduce the number of confitutional articles : The first confequence that would refult, not from the delufive, but the real establishment of this principle, would be the reduction of the conflictution to a very small number of articles. The impracticability of obtaining the deliberate approbation of a great number of districts to a very complicated code, would speedily manifest itself. In reality the conflictution of a state governed either in whole or in part by a political monopoly, must neceffarily be complicated. But what need of complexity in a country where the people are defined to govern themselves? The whole conflictution of fuch a country ought fearcely to exceed two articles; first, a feheme for the division of the whole into parts equal in their population, and, fecondly, the fixing of stated periods for the election of a national affembly : not to fay fay that the latter of these articles may very probably be dispensed with.

A fecond confequence that refults from the principle of which we are treating is as follows. It has already appeared, that the power: reafon is no lefs cogent for fubmitting important legiflative articles to the revifal of the diffricts, than for fubmitting the conftitutional articles themfelves. But after a few experiments of this fort, it cannot fail to fuggest itself, that the mode of fending laws to the diffricts for their revision, unless in cases effential to the general fafety, is a proceeding unneceffarily circuitous, and that it would be better, in as many inftances as poffible, to fuffer the districts to make laws for themselves without the intervention of the national affembly. The justness of this confequence is implicitly affumed in the preceding paragraph, while we flated the very narrow bounds within which the conftitution of an empire, fuch as that of France for example, might be circumfcribed. In reality, provided the country were divided into convenient diftricts with a power of fending reprefentatives to the general affembly, it does not appear that any ill confequences would enfue to the common caufe from these districts being permitted to regulate their internal affairs, in conformity to their own apprehenfions of justice. Thus, that which was at first a great empire with legiflative unity, would fpeedily be transformed into a confederacy of leffer republics, with a general congress or Amphictyonic council, answering the purpole of a point of cooperation upon 3

BOOK VI. CHAP.VIL.

parcel out the legislative

BOOK VI. upon extraordinary occafions. The ideas of a great empire and legiflative unity are plainly the barbarous remains of the days of military heroifm. In proportion as political power is brought home to the citizens, and fimplified into fomething of the nature of parifh regulation, the danger of mifunderftanding and rivalfhip will be nearly annihilated. In proportion as the fcience of government is divefted of its prefent myfterious appearances, focial truth will become obvious, and the diftricts pliant and flexible to the dictates of reafon.

and produce the gradual effimation of law.

4

A third confequence fufficiently memorable from the fame principle is the gradual extinction of law. A great affembly, collected from the different provinces of an extensive territory, and conflituted the fole legiflator of those by whom the territory is inhabited, immediately conjures up to itfelf an idea of the vaft multitude of laws that are neceffary for regulating the concerns of those whom it represents. A large city, impelled by the principles of commercial jealoufy, is not flow to digeft the volume of its by-laws and exclusive privileges. But the inhabitants of a fmall parifh, living with fome degree of that fimplicity which beft corresponds with the real nature and wants of a human being, would foon be led to fufpect that general laws were unneceffary, and would adjudge the caufes that came before them, not according to certain axioms previoufly written, but according to the circumftances and demand of each particular caufe.-It was proper that this confequence fhould be mentioned in this place. The benefits that will arife from the abolition of law will come to be confidered in detail in the following book.

in

The principal objection that is ufually made to the idea of Objection. confederacy confidered as the fubflitute of legiflative unity, is the poffibility that arifes of the members of the confederacy detaching themfelves from the fupport of the public caufe. To give this objection every advantage, let us fuppofe that the feat of the confederacy, like France, is placed in the midft of furrounding nations, and that the governments of these nations are anxious by every means of artifice and violence to fupprefs the infolent fpirit of liberty that has flarted up among this neighbour people. It is to be believed that even under these circumstances the dan- Answer. ger is more imaginary than real. The national affembly, being precluded by the fuppolition from the use of force against the malcontent diffricts, is obliged to confine itfelf to expoftulation ; and it is fufficiently obfervable that our powers of expoftulation are tenfold increafed the moment our hopes are confined to expoftulation alone. They have to defcribe with the utmost perspicuity and fimplicity the benefits of independence; to convince the public at large, that all they intend is to enable every diffrict, and as far as poffible every individual, to purfue unmolefted their own ideas of propriety; and that under their aufpices there shall be no tyranny, no arbitrary punifhments, fuch as proceed from the jealouty of councils and courts, no exactions, almost no taxation. Some ideas refpecting this laft fubject will fpeedily occur.

663

BOOK VI. CHAP. VII.

BOOK VI. It is not poffible but that, in a country refcued from the inveterate evils of defpotifm, the love of liberty fhould be confiderably diffufed. The adherents therefore of the public caufe will be many: the malcontents few. If a fmall number of diffricts were fo far blinded as to be willing to furrender themfelves to oppreffion and flavery, it is probable they would foon repent. Their defertion would infpire the more enlightened and courageous with additional energy. It would be a glorious fpectacle to fee the champions of the caufe of truth declaring that they defired none but willing fupporters. It is not poffible that fo magnanimous a principle fhould not contribute more to the advantage than the injury of their caufe.

CHAP.

5 665 T

CHAP. VIII.

OF NATIONAL EDUCATION.

ARGUMENTS IN ITS FAVOUR. ANSWER. I. IT PRODUCES PERMANENCE OF OPINION .- NATURE OF PREJUDICE AND JUDGMENT DESCRIBED .--- 2. 1T REQUIRES UNIFOR-MITY OF OPERATION .--- ?. IT IS THE MIRROR AND TOOL OF NATIONAL GOVERNMENT .- THE RIGHT OF PUNISH-ING NOT FOUNDED IN THE PREVIOUS FUNCTION OF IN-STRUCTING.

MODE in which government has been accuftomed to BOOK VI. interfere for the purpole of influencing opinion, is by the fuperintendence it has in a greater or lefs degree exerted in the article of education. It is worthy of obfervation that the idea of this fuperintendence has obtained the countenance of feveral of the most zealous advocates of political reform. The question relative to its propriety or impropriety is entitled on that account to the more deliberate examination.

The arguments in its favour have been already anticipated. Arguments " Can it be justifiable in those perfons, who are appointed to the functions of magiftracy, and whole duty it is to confult for in its favour.

the BOOK VI. the public welfare, to neglect the cultivation of the infant mind. and to fuffer its future excellence or depravity to be at the difpofal of fortune? Is it poffible for patriotifm and the love of the public to be made the characteristic of a whole people in any other way fo fuccefsfully, as by rendering the early communication of these virtues a national concern? If the education of our youth be entirely confided to the prudence of their parents or the accidental benevolence of private individuals, will it not be a neceffary confequence, that fome will be educated to virtue. others to vice, and others again entirely neglected?" To thefe confiderations it has been added, " That the maxim which has prevailed in the majority of civilifed countries, that ignorance of the law is no apology for the breach of it, is in the higheft degree iniquitous; and that government cannot juftly punifh us for our crimes when committed, unlefs it have forewarned us against their commission, which cannot be adequately done without fomething of the nature of public education."

The propriety or impropriety of any project for this purpofe Anfwer. must be determined by the general confideration of its beneficial or injurious tendency. If the exertions of the magiftrate in behalf of any fystem of instruction will stand the test as conducive to the public fervice, undoubtedly he cannot be juftified in neglecting them. If on the contrary they conduce to injury, it is wrong and unjuftifiable that they fhould be made.

666

The

The injuries that refult from a fystem of national education BOOK VI. are, in the first place, that all public establishments include in them the idea of permanence. They endeavour it may be to fecure and to diffuse whatever of advantageous to fociety is already known, but they forget that more remains to be known. If they realifed the moft fubftantial benefits at the time of their introduction, they must inevitably become lefs and lefs useful as they increafed in duration. But to defcribe them as ufelefs is a very feeble expression of their demerits. They actively restrain the flights of mind, and fix it in the belief of exploded errors. It has commonly been observed of universities and extensive eftablishments for the purpose of education, that the knowledge taught there, is a century behind the knowledge which exifts among the unfhackled and unprejudiced members of the fame political community. The moment any fcheme of proceeding gains a permanent eftablishment, it becomes impressed as one of its characteristic features with an aversion to change. Some violent concuffion may oblige its conductors to change an old fyftem of philosophy for a system less obsolete; and they are then as pertinaciously attached to this fecond doctrine as they were to the first. Real intellectual improvement demands that mind fhould as fpeedily as poffible be advanced to the height of knowledge already exifting among the enlightened members of the community, and ftart from thence in the purfuit of farther acquifitions. But public education has always expended its energies in the fupport of prejudice; it teaches its pupils, not the fortitude fortitude that fhall bring every proposition to the teft of examination, but the art of vindicating fuch tenets as may chance to be previoufly eftablished. We fludy Aristotle or Thomas Aquinas or Bellarmine or chief justice Coke, not that we may detect their errors, but that our minds may be fully impregnated with their abfurdities. This feature runs through every species of public establishment; and even in the petty infitution of Sunday schools, the chief leffons that are taught, are a superflitious veneration for the church of England, and to bow to every man in a handfome coat. All this is directly contrary to the true interest of mind. All this must be unlearned, before we can begin to be wife.

CHAP VIII I. It produces permanence of opinion.

BOOK VI. CHAP. VIII.

Nature of prejudice and judgment defcribed. It is the characteriftic of mind to be capable of improvement. An individual furrenders the beft attribute of man, the moment he refolves to adhere to certain fixed principles, for reafons not now prefent to his mind, but which formerly were. The inftant in which he fluts upon himfelf the career of enquiry, is the inftant of his intellectual deceafe. He is no longer a man; he is the ghoft of departed man. There can be no fcheme more egregioufly ftamped with folly, than that of feparating a tenet from the evidence upon which its validity depends. If I ceafe from the habit of being able to recal this evidence, my belief is no longer a perception, but a prejudice: it may influence me like a prejudice; but cannot animate me like a real apprehenfion of truth. The difference between the man thus guided, and the man.

man that keeps his mind perpetually alive, is the difference be- BOOK VI. tween cowardice and fortitude. The man who is in the heft fenfe an intellectual being, delights to recollect the reafons that have convinced him, to repeat them to others, that they may produce conviction in them, and fland more diffined and explicit in his own mind; and he adds to this a willingnefs to examine objections, becaufe he takes no pride in confiftent error.' The man who is not capable of this falutary exercife, to what valuable purpofe can he be employed ? Hence it appears that no vice can be more deftructive than that which teaches us to regard any judgment as final, and not open to review. The fame principle that applies to individuals applies to communities. There is no proposition, at prefent apprehended to be true, fo valuable as to justify the introduction of an establishment for the purpole of inculcating it on mankind. Refer them to reading, to conversation, to meditation; but teach them neither creeds nor catechifms, neither moral nor political.

Secondly, the idea of national education is founded in an in- 2. It requires attention to the nature of mind. Whatever each man does for operation. himfelf is done well; whatever his neighbours or his country undertake to do for him is done ill. It is our wifdom to incite men to act for themfelves, not to retain them in a flate of perpetual pupillage. He that learns becaufe he defires to learn, will listen to the instructions he receives, and apprehend their meaning. He that teaches becaufe he defires to teach, will difcharge his

uniformity of

EOOK VI. CHAP.VIII.

670

his occupation with enthuliafm and energy. But the moment political inflitution undertakes to affign to every man his place. the functions of all will be difcharged with fupineness and indifference. Univerfities and expensive establishments have long been remarked for formal dulnefs. Civil policy has given me the power to appropriate my effate to certain theoretical purpofes; but it is an idle prefumption to think I can entail my views, as I can entail my fortune. Remove all those obstacles which prevent men from feeing and reftrain them from purfuing their real advantage, but do not abfurdly undertake to relieve them from the activity which this purfuit requires. What I earn, what I acquire only becaufe I defire to acquire it, I effimate at its true value; but what is thruft upon me may make me indolent, but cannot make me respectable. It is extreme folly to endeavour to fecure to others, independently of exertion on their part, the means of being happy .- This whole propofition of a national education, is founded upon a fuppofition which has been repeatedly refuted in this work, but which has recurred upon us in a thousand forms, that unpatronised truth is inadequate to the purpose of enlightening mankind.

3. It is the migor and tool of national government.

Thirdly, the project of a national education ought uniformly to be discouraged on account of its obvious alliance with national government. This is an alliance of a more formidable nature, than the old and much contefted alliance of church and Before we put fo powerful a machine under the direction ftate.  $\mathbf{of}$ of fo ambiguous an agent, it behoves us to confider well what it BOOK VI. Government will not fail to employ it to is that we do. ftrengthen its hands, and perpetuate its inflitutions. If we could even fuppofe the agents of government not to propofe to themfelves an object, which will be apt to appear in their eyes, not merely innocent, but meritorious; the evil would not the lefs happen. Their views as inflitutors of a fyftem of education, will not fail to be analogous to their views in their political capacity: the data upon which their conduct as flatefmen is vindicated, will be the data upon which their inftructions are founded. It is not true that our youth ought to be inftructed to venerate the conftitution, however excellent; they fhould be inftructed to venerate truth; and the conftitution only fo far as it corresponded with their independent deductions of truth. Had the fcheme of a national education been adopted when defpotifm was ' oft triumphant, it is not to be believed that it could have for wer flifled the voice of truth. But it would have been the most formidable and profound contrivance for that purpose that imagination can fuggeft. Still, in the countries where liberty chiefly prevails, it is reafonably to be affumed that there are important errors, and a national education has the most direct tendency to perpetuate those errors, and to form all minds upon. one model.

OF NATIONAL EDUCATION.

It is not eafy to fay whether the remark, " that government The right of cannot juftly punish offenders, unless it have previously informed founded in them.

671

CHAP.VIII.

OF NATIONAL EDUCATION.

CHAP. VIII. the previous function of inflructing.

BOOK VI.

them what is virtue and what is offence," be entitled to a feparate answer. It is to be hoped that mankind will never have to learn fo important a leffon through fo corrupt a channel. Government may reafonably and equitably prefume that men who live in fociety know that enormous crimes are injurious to the public weal, without its being neceffary to announce them as fuch, by laws to be proclaimed by heralds, or expounded by curates. It has been alledged that " mere reafon may teach me not to strike my neighbour; but will never forbid my fending a fack of wool from England, or printing the French conflictution in Spain." This objection leads to the true diffinction upon the fubject. All real crimes are capable of being difcerned without the teaching of law. All fuppofed crimes, not capable of being fo difcerned, are truly and unalterably innocent. It is true that my own underftanding would never have told me that the exportation of wool was a vice: neither do I believe it is a vice now that a law has been made affirming it. It is a feeble and contemptible remedy for iniquitous punifhments, to fignify to mankind beforehand that you intend to inflict them. Nay, the remedy is worfe than the evil: deftroy me if you pleafe; but do not endeavour by a national education to deftroy in my underftanding the difcernment of juffice and injuffice. The idea of fuch an education, or even perhaps of the neceffity of a written law, would never have occurred, if government and jurifprudence had never attempted the arbitrary conversion of innocence into guilt.

CHAP.

[ 673 ]

CHAP. IX.

OF PENSIONS AND SALARIES.

REASONS BY WHICH THEY ARE VINDICATED .- LABOUR IN ITS USUAL ACCEPTATION AND LABOUR FOR THE PUBLIC COMPARED .- IMMORAL EFFECTS OF THE INSTITUTION OF SALARIES .--- SOURCE FROM WHICH THEY ARE DE-RIVED-UNNECESSARY FOR THE SUBSISTENCE OF THE PUBLIC FUNCTIONARY-FOR DIGNITY .- SALARIES OF INFERIOR OFFICERS-MAY ALSO BE SUPERSEDED.-TAX. ATION.-QUALIFICATIONS.

N article which deferves the maturest confideration, and BOOK VI. by means of which political inflitution does not fail to produce the most important influence upon opinion, is that of the mode of rewarding public fervices. The mode which has obtained in all European countries is that of pecuniary reward. He who is employed to act in behalf of the public, is recompenfed with a falary. He who retires from that employment, is recompensed with a pension. The arguments in support of this fystem are well known. It has been remarked, " that it may Reasons on indeed be creditable to individuals to be willing to ferve their fitution of falaries is country without a reward, but that it is a becoming pride on the founded.

CHAP. IX.

which the in-part of the public, to refuse to receive as an alms that for which BOOK VL CHAP. IX. they are well able to pay. If one man, animated by the most difinterested motives, be permitted to ferve the public upon these terms, another will affume the exterior of difinterestedness, as a ftep towards the gratification of a finister ambition. If men be not openly and directly paid for the fervices they perform, we may reft affured that they will pay themfelves by ways ten thousand times more injurious. He who devotes himself to the public, ought to devote himfelf entire : he will therefore be injured in his perfonal fortune, and ought to be replaced. Add to this, that the fervants of the public ought by their appearances and mode of living to command refpect both from their own countrymen and from foreigners; and that this circumftance will require an expence for which it is the duty of their country to provide *."

Labour in its ufual acceptation and labour for the public compared,

Before this argument can be fufficiently effimated, it will be neceffary for us to confider the analogy between labour in its moft ufual acceptation and labour for the public fervice, what are the points in which they refemble and in which they differ. If I cultivate a field the produce of which is neceffary for my fubfiftence, this is an innocent and laudable action, the first object it proposes is my own emolument, and it cannot be unreafonable that that object fhould be much in my contemplation

* The fubftance of these arguments may be found in Mr. Burke's Speech on Oeconomical Reform. while while the labour is performing. If I cultivate a field the produce BOOK VI. of which is not neceffary to my fubfiftence, but which I propofe to give in barter for a garment, the cafe then becomes different. The action here does not properly fpeaking begin in myfelf. Its immediate object is to provide food for another; and it feems to be in fome degree a perversion of intellect, that causes me to place in an inferior point of view the inherent quality of the action, and to do that which is in the first instance benevolent, from a partial retrofpect to my own advantage. Still the perverfion here, at leaft to our habits of reflecting and judging, does not appear violent. The action differs only in form from that which is direct. I employ that labour in cultivating a field, which must otherwife be employed in manufacturing a garment. The garment I propose to myself as the end of my labour. We are not apt to conceive of this fpecies of barter and trade as greatly injurious to our moral difcernment.

But then this is an action in the flighteft degree indirect. It does not follow, becaufe we are induced to do fome actions immediately beneficial to others from a felfifh motive, that we can admit of this in all inftances with impunity. It does not follow, becaufe we are fometimes inclined to be felfifh, that we muft never be generous. The love of our neighbour is the great ornament of a moral nature. The perception of truth is the moft folid improvement of an intellectual nature. He that fees nothing in the univerfe deferving of regard but himfelf, is BOOK VI. CHAP. IX. a confummate ftranger to the dictates of immutable reafon. He that is not influenced in his conduct by the real and inherent natures of things, is rational to no purpofe. Admitting that it is venial to do fome actions immediately beneficial to my neighbour from a partial retrofpect to myfelf, furely there muft be other actions in which I ought to forget, or endeavour to forget myfelf. This duty is most obligatory in actions most extensive in their confequences. If a thousand men be to be benefited, I ought to recollect that I am only an atom in the comparison, and to reafon accordingly.

Immoral effects of the inftitution of falaries :

These confiderations may qualify us to decide upon the article of penfions and falaries. Surely it ought not to be the end of a good political inflitution to increase our felfishness, instead of fuffering it to dwindle and decay. If we pay an ample falary to him who is employed in the public fervice, how are we fure that he will not have more regard to the falary than to the public ? If we pay a fmall falary, yet the very existence of fuch a payment will oblige men to compare the work performed and the reward beftowed; and all the confequence that will refult will be to drive the beft men from the fervice of their country, a fervice first degraded by being paid, and then paid with an illtimed parfimony. Whether the falary be large or fmall, if a falary exift, many will defire the office for the fake of its appen-Functions the most extensive in their confequences will dage. be converted into a trade. How humiliating will it be to the functionary functionary himfelf, amidst the complication and fubtlety of BOOK VI. motives, to doubt whether the falary were not one of his inducements to the accepting the office? If he ftand acquitted to himfelf. it is however still to be regretted, that grounds should be afforded to his countrymen, which tempt them to mifinterpret his views.

Another confideration of great weight in this inftance is that of fource from the fource from which falaries are derived : from the public are derived revenue, from taxes imposed upon the community. But there is no practicable mode of collecting the fuperfluities of the community. Taxation, to be ftrictly equal, if it demand from the man of an hundred a year ten pounds, ought to demand from. the man of a thousand a year nine hundred and ten. Taxation will always be unequal and oppreffive, wrefting the hard earned morfel from the gripe of the peafant, and fparing him moftwhofe fuperfluities most defy the limits of justice. I will not fay that the man of clear difcernment and an independent mind. would rather ftarve than be fubfifted at the public coft: but I will fay, that it is fcarcely poffible to devife any expedient for his fubfiftence that he would not rather accept.

Meanwhile the difficulty under this head is by no means infu- unneceffary perable. The majority of the perfons chosen for public employ. fiftence of ment, under any fituation of mankind approaching to the functionary : prefent, will poffess a perfonal fortune adequate to their support.

for the fubthe public

Thole

which they 677

CHAP.IX.

BOOK VI. Those felected from a different class, will probably be felected CHAP. IX. for extraordinary talents, which will naturally lead to extraordi- * nary refources. It has been deemed difhonourable to fublift upon private liberality; but this different is produced only by the difficulty of reconciling this mode of fubfiftence and intellectual independence. It is free from many of the objections that have been urged against a public flipend. I ought to receive your fuperfluity as my due, while I am employed in affairs more important than that of earning a fubfiftence; but at the fame time to receive it with a total indifference to perfonal advantage, taking only precifely what is neceffary for the fupply of my wants. He that liftens to the dictates of juffice and turns a deaf ear to the dictates of pride, will with that the conftitution of his country fhould caft him for fupport on the virtue of individuals, rather than provide for his fupport at the public expence. That virtue will, in this as in all other inftances, increafe, the more it is called into action. "But what if he have a wife and children ?" Let many aid him, if the aid of one be infufficient. Let him do in his lifetime what Eudamidas did at his decease, bequeath his daughter to be subsisted by one friend, and his mother by another. This is the only true taxation, which he that is able, and thinks himfelf able, affeffes on himfelf, not which he endeavours to difcharge upon the fhoulders of the poor. It is a ftriking example of the power of venal governments in generating prejudice, that this fcheme of ferving the public functions without falaries, fo common among the ancient republicans, 5

licans, should by liberal minded men of the prefent day be deemed impracticable. It is not to be believed that those readers who already pant for the abolition of government and regulations in all their branches, fhould hefitate refpecting fo eafy an advance towards this defirable object. Nor let us imagine that the fafety of the community will depend upon the fervices of an individual. In the country in which individuals fit for . the public fervice are rare, the post of honour will be his, not that fills an official fituation, but that from his clofet endeavours to waken the fleeping virtues of mankind. In the country where they are frequent, it will not be difficult by the fhort duration of the employment to compenfate for the flendernefs of the means of him that fills it. It is not eafy to defcribe the advantages that muft refult from this proceeding. The public functionary would in every article of his charge recollect the motives of public fpirit and benevolence. He would hourly improve in the energy and difintereftedness of his character. The habits created by a frugal fare and a chearful poverty, not hid as now in obscure retreats, but held forth to public view, and honoured with public efteem, would fpeedily pervade the community, and aufpicioufly prepare them for still farther improvements.

The objection, "that it is neceffary for him who acts on the for dignity. part of the public to make a certain figure, and to live in a ftyle calculated to excite refpect," does not deferve a feparate anfwer. The whole fpirit of this treatife is in direct hoftility to this objection.

679

BOOK VI.

BOOK VI. CHAP. IX. jection. If therefore it have not been anfwered already, it would be vain to attempt an anfwer in this place. It is recorded of the burghers of the Netherlands who confpired to throw off the Auftrian yoke, that they came to the place of confultation each man with his knapfack of provifions : who is there that feels inclined to defpife this fimplicity and honourable poverty ? The abolition of falaries would doubtlefs render neceffary the fimplification and abridgment of public bufinefs. This would be a benefit and not a difadvantage.

Salaries of inferior officers : It will farther be objected that there are certain functionaries in the lower departments of government, fuch as clerks and taxgatherers, whofe employment is perpetual, and whofe fubfiftence ought for that reafon to be made the refult of their employment. If this objection were admitted, its confequences would be of fubordinate importance. The office of a clerk or a tax-gatherer is confiderably fimilar to those of mere barter and trade; and therefore to degrade it altogether to their level, would have little refemblance to the fixing fuch a degradation upon offices that demand the most clevated mind. The annexation of a flipend to fuch employments, if confidered only as a matter of temporary accommodation, might perhaps be endured.

may alfo be fuperfeded. But the exception, if admitted, ought to be admitted with great caution. He that is employed in an affair of public neceffity. ought to feel, while he difcharges it, its true character.

- -

racter. We fhould never allow ourfelves to undertake an office BOOK VI. of a public nature, without feeling ourielves animated with a We shall otherwife discharge our trust with compublic zeal. parative coldness and neglect. Nor is this all. The abolition Taxation. of falaries would lead to the abolition of those offices to which falaries are thought neceffary. If we had neither foreign wars nor domeftic flipends, taxation would be almost unknown; and, if we had no taxes to collect, we fhould want no clerks to keep an account of them. In the fimple fcheme of political inftitution which reafon dictates, we could fcarcely have any burdenfome offices to difcharge; and, if we had any that fere fo in their abstract nature, they might be rendered light by the perpetual rotation of their holders.

If we have no falaries, for a ftill ftronger reafon we ought to Qualificahave no pecuniary qualifications, or in other words no regulation requiring the poffeffion of a certain property, as a condition to the right of electing or the capacity of being elected. It is an uncommon strain of tyranny to call upon men to appoint for themfelves a delegate, and at the fame time forbid them to appoint exactly the man whom they may judge fitteft for the office. Qualification in both kinds is the most flagrant injustice. It afferts the man to be of lefs value than his property. It furnifhes to the candidate a new ftimulus to the accumulation of wealth; and this paffion, when once fet in motion, is not eafily allayed. It tells him, "Your intellectual and moral qualifications tions.

68 t

BOOK VI. CHAP. IX.

זר

682

tions may be of the higheft order; but you have not enough of the means of luxury and vice." To the non-elector it holds the most deteftable language. It fays, "You are poor; you are unfortunate; the inftitutions of fociety oblige you to be the perpetual witness of other men's fuperfluity : because you are funk thus low, we will trample you yet lower; you shall not even be reckoned in the lifts for a man, you shall be passed by as one of whom fociety makes no account, and whose welfare and moral existence the difdains to recollect."

F 683 ]

CHAP. X.

OF THE MODES OF DECIDING A QUESTION ON THE PART OF THE COMMUNITY.

DECISION BY LOT, ITS ORIGIN-FOUNDED IN THE SYSTEM OF DISCRETIONARY RIGHTS-IMPLIES THE DESERTION OF DUTY .- DECISION BY BALLOT -- INCULCATES TIMI-DITY-AND HYPOCRISY .- DECISION BY VOTE, ITS RE-COMMENDATIONS.

7 HAT has been here faid upon the fubject of qualifica-BOOK VI. tions, naturally leads to a few important obfervations upon the three principal modes of conducting election, by fortition, by ballot or by vote.

lot, its origin :

СНАР. Х.

The idea of fortition was first introduced by the dictates of Decision by fuperflition. It was fuppofed that, when human reafon pioufly acknowledged its infufficiency, the Gods, pleafed with fo unfeigned a homage, interfered to guide the decifion. This imagination is now exploded. Every man who pretends to philofophy will confess that, wherever fortition is introduced, the decifion is exclusively guided by the laws of impulse and gravitation .- Strictly fpeaking there is no fuch thing as contingence. But.

4 S 2

684 OF THE MODES OF DECIDING A QUESTION

BOOK VI. But, fo far as relates to the exercise of apprehension and judgment on the particular question to be determined, all decision by lot is the decision of contingence. The operations of impulse and gravitation either proceed from a blind and unconfcious principle; or, if they proceed from mind, it is mind executing general laws, and not temporifing with every variation of human caprice.

founded in the fyftem of diferetionary rights:

All reference of public queftions and elections to lot includes: in it two evils, moral misapprehension and cowardice. Thereis no fituation in which we can be placed that has not its correfpondent duties. There is no alternative that can be offered to our choice, that does not include in it a better and a worfe. The idea of fortition derives from the fame root as the idea of difcretionary rights. Men, undebauched by the leffons of fuperfition, would never have recourfe to the decifion by lot, were they not impreffed with the notion of indifference, that they had a right to do any one of two or more things offered to their choice; and that of confequence, in order to rid themfelves of uncertainty and doubt, it was fufficiently allowable to refer the decifion of certain matters to accident. It is of great importance that this idea fhould be extirpated. Mind will never arrive at the true tone of energy, till we feel that moral liberty and difcretion are mere creatures of the imagination, that in all cafes our duty is precife, and the path of juffice fingle and direct.

But,

ON THE PART OF THE COMMUNITY

But, fuppofing us convinced of this principle, if we afterwards BOOK VI. defert it, this is the most contemptible cowardice. Our defertion either arifes from our want of energy to enquire, to com- defertion of . pare and to decide, or from our want of fortitude to defpife the inconveniences that might attend upon our compliance with what our judgment dictates.

Ballot is a mode of decifion ftill more centurable than forti- Decifion by It is fcarcely poffible to conceive of a political inflitution tion. that includes a more direct and explicit patronage of vice. It has been faid, "that ballot may in certain cafes be neceffary to enable a man of a feeble character to act with eafe and independence, and to prevent bribery, corrupt influence and faction." Vice is an ill remedy to apply to the diminution of vice. A inculcates feeble and irrefolute character might before be accidental; ballot is a contrivance to render it permanent, and to fcatter its feeds over a wider furface. The true cure for a want of conftancy and public fpirit is to infpire firmnefs, not to infpire timidity. Truth, if communicated to the mind with perfpicuity, is a fufficient bafis for virtue. To tell men that it is neceffary they should form their decision by ballot, is to tell them that it is neceffary they fhould be vicious.

If fortition taught us to defert our duty, ballot teaches us to and hypocrify. draw a veil of concealment over our performance of it. It points out to us a method of acting unobferved. It incites us to make a myftery ballot :

685 CHAP X

implies the duty.

timidity :

686 OF THE MODES OF DECIDING A QUESTION, &c.

BOOK VI. CHAP. X.

a mystery of our fentiments. If it did this in the most trivial article, it would not be eafy to bring the mifchief it would produce within the limits of calculation. But it dictates this conduct in our most important concerns. It calls upon us to discharge our duty to the public with the most virtuous constancy; but at the fame time directs us to hide our difcharge of it. One of the most admirable principles in the structure of the material univerfe, is its tendency to prevent us from withdrawing ourfelves from the consequences of our own actions. Political inftitution that fhould attempt to counteract this principle, would be the only true impiety. How can a man have the love of the public in his heart, without the dictates of that love flowing to his lips? When we direct men to act with fecrecy, we direct them to act with frigidity. Virtue will always be an unufual fpectacle among men, till they shall have learned to be at all times ready to avow their actions and affign the reafons upon which they are founded.

Decifion by vote, its recommendations. If then fortition and ballot be inflitutions pregnant with vice, it follows, that all focial decifions fhould be made by open vote; that, wherever we have a function to difcharge, we fhould reflect on the mode in which it ought to be difcharged; and that, whatever conduct we are perfuaded to adopt, effecially in affairs of general concern, fhould be adopted in the face of the world.

ENQUIRY

CONCERNING

POLITICAL JUSTICE.

BOOK VII.

OF CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS.

CHAP. I.

LIMITATIONS OF THE DOCTRINE OF PUNISHMENT WHICH RESULT FROM THE PRINCIPLES OF MORALITY.

DEFINITION OF PUNISHMENT.—NATURE OF CRIME.—RE-TRIBUTIVE JUSTICE NOT INDEPENDENT AND ABSOLUTE —NOT TO BE VINDICATED FROM THE SYSTEM OF NA-TURE.—DESERT A CHIMERICAL PROPERTY.—CONCLU-SION.

THE fubject of punifhment is perhaps the most fundamental in the fcience of politics. Men affociated for the fake of mutual protection and benefit. It has already appeared, that BOOK VII. CHAP. I.

the

LIMITATIONS OF THE

BOOK VII. CHAP. I. the internal affairs of fuch affociations are of infinitely greater importance than their external *. It has appeared that the action of fociety in conferring rewards and fuperintending opinion is of pernicious effect †. Hence it follows that government, or the action of the fociety in its corporate capacity, can fcarcely be of any utility, except fo far as it is requifite for the fupprefilon of force by force; for the prevention of the hoftile attack of one member of the fociety upon the perfon or property of another, which prevention is ufually called by the name of criminal juffice, or punifhment.

Definition of Funifhment.

Before we can properly judge of the neceffity or urgency of this action of government, it will be of fome importance to confider the precife import of the word punifhment. I may employ force to counteract the hoftility that is actually committing on me. I may employ force to compel any member of the fociety to occupy the poft that I conceive moft conducive to the general advantage, either in the mode of impreffing foldiers and failors, or by obliging a military officer or a minister of state to accept or retain his appointment. I may put an innocent man to death for the common good, either becaufe he is infected with a peftilential difeafe, or becaufe fome oracle has declared it effential to the public fafety. None of thefe, though they confift in the exertion of force for fome moral purpole, comes within the import of the word punifhment. Punishment is generally

* Book V, Chap. XX. † Book V, Chap. XII. Book VI, paffim.

DOCTRINE OF PUNISHMENT.

generally used to fignify the voluntary infliction of evil upon a BOOK VII. vicious being, not merely becaufe the public advantage demands it, but becaufe there is apprehended to be a certain fitnefs and propriety in the nature of things, that render fuffering, abftractedly from the benefit to refult, the fuitable concomitant of vice.

The juffice of punifliment therefore, in the flrict import of Nature of crime. the word, can only be a deduction from the hypothesis of freewill, and must be falle, if human actions be neceffary. Mind, as was fufficiently apparent when we treated of that fubject *, is an agent, in no other fenfe than matter is an agent. It operates ' and is operated upon, and the nature, the force and line of direction of the first, is exactly in proportion to the nature, force and line of direction of the fecond. Morality in a rational and defigning mind is not effentially different from morality in an inanimate fubstance. A man of certain intellectual habits is fitted to be an affaffin, a dagger of a certain form is fitted to be his inftrument. The one or the other excites a greater degree of difapprobation, in proportion as its fitnefs for mifchievous purpofes appears to be more inherent and direct. I view a dagger on this account with more difapprobation than a knife, which is perhaps equally adapted for the purposes of the affaffin; becaufe the dagger has few or no beneficial ufes to weigh against those that are hurtful, and because it has a tendency by means

> * Book IV, Chap. VI. 4 T of

LIMITATIONS OF THE

CHAP. I.

BOOK VII. of affociation to the exciting of evil thoughts. I view the affaffin with more difapprobation than the dagger, because he is more to be feared, and it is more difficult to change his vicious ftructure or take from him his capacity to injure. The man is propelled to act by neceffary caufes and irrefiftible motives, which, having once occurred, are likely to occur again. The dagger has no quality adapted to the contraction of habits, and, though it have committed a thousand murders, is not at all more likely (unlefs fo far as those murders, being known, may operate as a flight affociated motive with the poffeffor) to commit murder again. Except in the articles here fpecified, the two cafes are exactly parallel. The affaffin cannot help the murder he commits any more than the dagger.

Retributive juffice not independent and absolute :

Thefe arguments are merely calculated to fet in a more perfpicuous light a principle, which is admitted by many by whom the doctrine of neceffity has never been examined; that the only measure of equity is utility, and whatever is not attended with any beneficial purpofe, is not just. This is fo evident a proposition that few reasonable and reflecting minds will be found inclined to reject it. Why do I inflict fuffering on another? If neither for his own benefit nor the benefit of others, can that be right ? Will refentment, the mere indignation and horror I have conceived against vice, justify me in putting a being to ufelefs torture? "But fuppofe I only put an end to his existence." What, with no prospect of benefit either to himfelf himfelf or others ? The reafon the mind cafily reconciles itfelf BOOK VII. to this fuppolition is, that we conceive existence to be lefs a bleffing than a curfe to a being incorrigibly vicious. But in that cafe the fuppolition does not fall within the terms of the queftion : I am in reality conferring a benefit. It has been afked, "If we conceive to ourfelves two beings, each of them folitary, but the first virtuous and the fecond vicious, the first inclined to the higheft acts of benevolence, if his fituation were changed for the focial, the fecond to malignity, tyranny and injuffice, do we not feel that the first is entitled to felicity in preference to the fecond ?" If there be any difficulty in the queftion, it is wholly caufed by the extravagance of the fuppofition. No being can be either virtuous or vicious who has no opportunity of influencing the happinels of others. He may indeed, though now folitary, recollect or imagine a focial flate ; but this fentiment and the propenfities it generates can fcarcely be vigorous, unlefs he have hopes of being at fome future time reffored to that flate. The true folitaire cannot be confidered as a moral being, unlefs the morality we contemplate be that which has relation to his own permanent advantage. But, if that be our meaning, punifhment, unlefs for reform, is peculiarly abfurd. His conduct is vicious, becaufe it has a tendency to render him miferable : thall we inflict calamity upon him. for this reafon only becaufe he has already inflicted calamity upon himfelf? It is difficult for us to imagine to ourfelves a folitary intellectual being, whom no future accident shall ever 4 T 2 render

LIMITATIONS OF THE

BOOK VII. CHAP. I. render focial. It is difficult for us to feparate even in idea virtue and vice from happines and misery; and of confequence not to imagine that, when we beftow a benefit upon virtue, we beftow it where it will turn to account; and, when we beftow a benefit upon vice, we beftow it where it will be unproductive. For these reasons the question of a folitary being will always be extravagant and unintelligible, but will never convince.

not to be vindicated from the fyftem of nature. It has fometimes been alledged that the very courfe of nature has annexed fuffering to vice, and has thus led us to the idea of punifhment. Arguments of this fort muft be liftened to with great caution. It was by reafonings of a fimilar nature that our anceftors juftified the practice of religious perfecution : "Heretics and unbelievers are the objects of God's indignation; it muft therefore be meritorious in us to mal-treat those whom God has curfed." We know too little of the fystem of the universe, are too liable to error respecting it, and see too small a portion of the whole, to entitle us to form our moral principles upon an imitation of what we conceive to be the courfe of nature.

It is an extreme error to fuppofe that the course of nature is fomething arbitrarily adjusted by a designing mind. Let us once conceive a fystem of percipient beings to exist, and all that we know of the history of man follows from that conception as fo many inevitable consequences. Mind beginning to exist must have begun from ignorance, must have received idea after idea,

2

DOCTRINE OF PUNISHMENT.

idea. must have been liable to erroneous conclusions from imperfect conceptions. We fay that the fyftem of the universe has annexed happiness to virtue and pain to vice. We should speak more accurately if we faid, that virtue would not be virtue nor vice be vice, if this connection could ceafe. The office of the principle, whether mind or whatever elfe, to which the univerfe owes its existence, is less that of fabricating than conducting : is not the creation of truth, and the connecting ideas and propolitions which had no original relation to each other, but the rendering truth, the nature of which is unalterable, an active and vivifying principle. It cannot therefore be good reafoning to fay, the fyftem of nature annexes unhappinefs to vice, or in other words vice brings its own punifhment along with it, therefore it would be unjust in us not by a positive interference to render that punifhment double.

Thus it appears, whether we enter philosophically into the Defert a chiprinciple of human actions, or merely analyfe the ideas of rectitude and juffice which have the universal confent of mankind, that, accurately fpeaking, there is no fuch thing as defert. It cannot be just that we should inflict fuffering on any man, except fo far as it tends to good. Hence it follows that the ftrict acceptation of the word punifhment by no means accords with any found principles of reafoning. It is right that I fhould inflict fuffering, in every cafe where it can be clearly flown that fuch merical pro--

693

BOOK VII. CHAP. J.

LIMITATIONS OF THE

CHAP. I.

BOOK VII. fuch infliction will produce an overbalance of good. But this infliction bears no reference to the mere innocence or guilt of the perfon upon whom it is made. An innocent man is the proper fubject of it, if it tend to good. A guilty man is the proper fubject of it under no other point of view. To punish him upon any hypothefis for what is paft and irrecoverable and for the confideration of that only, muft be ranked among the wildeft conceptions of untutored barbarifm. Every man upon whom difcipline is administered, is to be confidered as to the rationale of this difcipline as innocent. Xerxes was not more unreafonable when he lashed the waves of the fea, than that man would be who inflicted fuffering on his fellow, from a view to the paft. and not from a view to the future.

Conclution.

It is of the utmost importance that we should bear these ideas conftantly in mind during our whole examination of the theory of punishment. This theory would in the past transactions of mankind have been totally different, if they had divefted themfelves of all emotions of anger and refentment; if they had confidered the man who torments another for what he has done, as upon par with the child who beats the table; if they had figured to their imagination, and then properly estimated, the man, who fhould fhut up in prifon fome atrocious criminal, and afterwards torture him at flated periods, merely in confideration of the abstract congruity of crime and punishment, without any poffible

DOCTRINE OF PUNISHMENT.

ble benefit to others or to himfelf; if they had regarded BOOK VII. infliction as that which was to be regulated folely by a difpaffionate calculation of the future, without fuffering the paft, in itfelf confidered, for a moment to enter into the account.

[ 696 ]

CHAP. II.

GENERAL DISADVANTAGES OF COERCION.

CONSCIENCE IN MATTERS OF RELIGION CONSIDERED—IN THE CONDUCT OF LIFE.—BEST PRACTICABLE CRITERION OF DUTY—NOT THE DECISION OF OTHER MEN—BUT OF OUR OWN UNDERSTANDING.—TENDENCY OF COER-CION.—ITS VARIOUS CLASSES CONSIDERED.

BOOK VII. CHAP. II. AVING thus precluded all ideas of punifhment or retribution flrictly fo called, it belongs to us in the farther difcuffion of this intercfling fubject, to think merely of that coercion, which has ufually been employed againft perfons convicted of paft injurious action, for the purpofe of preventing future mifchief. And here we will first confider what is the quantity of evil which accrues from all fuch coercion, and fecondly examine the cogency of the various reafons by which this coercion is recommended. It will not be poffible wholly to avoid the repetition of fome of the reafons which occurred in the preliminary difcuffion of the exercife of private judgment *. But thofe reafonings will now be extended, and derive additional advantage from a fuller arrangement.

* Book II, Chap. VI.

GENERAL DISADVANTAGES OF COERCION.

It is commonly faid that no man ought to be compelled in BOOK VII. matters of religion to act contrary to the dictates of his confcience. Religion is a principle which the practice of all ages matters of has deeply impreffed upon the mind. He that difcharges what fidered : his own apprehenfions prefcribe to him on the fubject, ftands approved to the tribunal of his own mind, and, confcious of rectitude in his intercourfe with the author of nature, cannot fail to obtain the greateft of those advantages, whatever may be their amount, which religion has to beftow. It is in vain that I endeavour by perfecuting flatutes to compel him to refign a falle religion for a true. Arguments may convince, but perfecution cannot. The new religion, which I oblige him to profefs contrary to his conviction, however pure and holy it may be in its own nature, has no benefits in flore for him. The fublimest worfhip becomes transformed into a fource of corruption, when it is not confecrated by the teftimony of a pure confeience. Truth is the fecond object in this refpect, integrity of heart is the first: or rather a proposition, that in its abstract nature is truth itself. converts into rank falfhood and mortal poifon, if it be profeffed with the lips only, and abjured by the understanding. It is then the foul garb of hypocrify. Inftead of elevating the mind above fordid temptations, it perpetually reminds the worfhipper of the abject pufillanimity to which he has yielded. Inftead of filling him with facred confidence, it overwhelms with confusion and remorfe.

CHAP. II. Confeience in religion con-

б97

GENERAL DISADVANTAGES

BOOK VII. CHAP. II.

505

The inference that has been made from these reasonings is, that criminal law is eminently mifapplied in affairs of religion, and that its true province is civil mifdemeanours. But this inference is falfe. It is only by an unaccountable perversion of reason, that men have been induced to affirm that religion is the facred province of confcience, and that moral duty may be left undefined to the decifion of the magistrate. What, is it of no confequence whether I be the benefactor of my fpecies, or their bittereft enemy? whether I be an informer, or a robber, or a murderer? whether I be employed as a foldier to extirpate my fellow beings, or be called upon as a citizen to contribute my property to their extirpation? whether I tell the truth with that firmnefs and unreferve which ardent philanthropy will not fail to infpire, or fupprefs fcience left I be convicted of blafphemy, and fact left I be convicted of a libel? whether I contribute my efforts for the furtherance of political justice, or quietly fubmit to the exile of a family of whofe claims I am an advocate, or to the fubverfion of liberty for which every man fhould be ready to die ? Nothing can be more clear, than that the value of religion, or of any other species of abstract opinion, lies in its moral tendency. If I fhould be ready to fet at nought the civil power for the fake of that which is the means, how much more when it rifes in contradiction to the end ?

Bell practicable criterion of duty: Of all human concerns morality is the most interesting. It is the perpetual affociate of our transactions: there is no fituation

in

OF COERCION.

in which we can be placed, no alternative that can be prefented BOOK VIL. to our choice, refpecting which duty is filent. "What is the ftandard of morality and duty?" Juffice. Not the arbitrary decrees that are in force in a particular climate; but those laws of eternal reafon that are equally obligatory wherever man is to be found. "But the rules of juffice often appear to us obscure, doubtful and contradictory; what criterion shall be applied to deliver us from uncertainty ?" There are but two criterions not the depoffible, the decifions of other men's wifdom, and the decifions other men: of our own understanding. Which of these is conformable to the nature of man ? Can we furrender our own underftandings ? However we may ftrain after implicit faith, will not confcience in fpite of ourfelves whilper us, "This decree is equitable, and this decree is founded in miftake?" Will there not be in the minds of the votaries of fuperfittion, a perpetual diffatisfaction. a defire to believe what is dictated to them, accompanied with a want of that in which belief confifts, evidence and conviction? If we could furrender our underftandings, what fort of beings fhould we become? By the terms of the proposition we should not be rational: the nature of things would prevent us from. being moral, for morality is the judgment of reafon, employed in determining on the effects to refult from the different kinds of conduct we may obferve.

CHAP. II.

699

cifions of

Hence it follows that there is no criterion of duty to any man but of ourbut in the exercise of his private judgment. Whatever attempts flanding.

own under-

4U2

GENERAL DISADVANTAGES

BOOK VIL to preferibe to his conduct, and to deter him from any courfe of CHAP. II. action by penalties and threats, is an execrable tyranny. There may be fome men of fuch inflexible virtue as to fet human ordinances at defiance. It is generally believed that there are others fo depraved, that, were it not for penalties and threats, the whole order of fociety would be fubverted by their exceffes. But what will become of the great mafs of mankind, who are neither fo virtuous as the first, nor fo degenerate as the fecond ? They are fuccefsfully converted by politive laws into latitudinarians and cowards. They yield like wax to the impreffion that is made upon them. Directed to infer the precepts of duty from the dieta of the magistrate, they are too timid to refist, and too fhort fighted to detect the imposition. It is thus that the mass of mankind have been condemned to a tedious imbecility.

Tendency of evercion.

700

There is no criterion of duty to any man but in the exercife of his private judgment. Has coercion any tendency to enlighten the judgment? Certainly not. Judgment is the perceived agreement or difagreement of two ideas, the perceived truth or falfhood of any propolition. Nothing can aid this perception, that does not fet the ideas in a clearer light, that does not afford new evidence of the fubftantialnefs or unfubftantialnefs of the propolition. The direct tendency of coercion is to fet our underftanding and our fears, our duty and our weaknefs at variance with each other. And how poor fpirited a refuge does does coercion afford ? If what you require of me is duty, are BOOK VII. there no reafons that will prove it to be fuch? If you understand more of eternal juffice than I, and are thereby fitted to inftruct me, cannot you convey the fuperior knowledge you poffers from your understanding into mine ? Will you fet your wit against one who is intellectually a child, and becaufe you are better informed than I, affume, not to be my preceptor, but my tyrant? Am I not a rational being? Could I refift your arguments, if they were demonstrative? The odious fystem of coercion, first annihilates the understanding of the fubject, and then of him that adopts it. Dreffed in the fupine prerogatives of a mafter, he is excufed from cultivating the faculties of a man. What would not man have been, long before this, if the proudeft of us had no hopes but in argument, if he knew of no refort beyond, and if he were obliged to tharpen his faculties. and collect his powers, as the only means of effecting his purpofes?

Let us reflect for a moment upon the fpecies of argument, if argument it is to be called, that coercion employs. It avers to its victim that he must necessarily be in the wrong, because I am more vigorous and more cunning than he. Will vigour and cunning be always on the fide of truth? Every fuch exertion implies in its nature a species of contest. This contest may be decided before it is brought to open trial by the defpair of one of the parties. But it is not always fo. The thief that by main force

GENERAL DISADVANTAGES

BOOK VII. force furmounts the flrength of his purfuers, or by ftratagem and CHAP. II. ingenuity escapes from their toils, fo far as this argument is valid, proves the juffice of his caufe. Who can refrain from indignation when he fees juffice thus miferably profituted? Who does not feel, the moment the contest begins, the full extent of the abfurdity that this appeal includes? It is not eafy to decide which of the two is most deeply to be deplored, the magistracy, the representative of the focial fystem, that declares war against one of its members, in the behalf of justice, or in the behalf of oppreffion. In the first we fee truth throwing afide her native arms and her intrinfic advantage, and putting herfelf upon a level with falfhood. In the fecond we fee falfhood confident in the cafual advantage the poffeffes, artfully extinguishing the new born light that would shame her in the midft of her usurped authority. The exhibition in both is that of an infant crushed in the merciless grasp of a giant. No fophiftry can be more palpable than that which pretends to bring the two parties to an impartial hearing. Obferve the confiftencyof this reafoning. We first vindicate political coercion, becaufe the criminal has committed an offence against the community at large, and then pretend, while we bring him to the bar of the community, the offended party, that we bring him before an impartial umpire. Thus in England, the king by his attorney is the profecutor, and the king by his reprefentative is the judge. How long fhall fuch odious inconfiftencies impofe on mankind ? The purfuit commenced against the supposed offender is the poffe comitatus, the armed force of the whole, drawn out in fuch BOOK VII. portions as may be judged neceflary; and when feven millions of men have got one poor, unaffifted individual in their power, they are then at leifure to torture or to kill him, and to make his agonies a fpectacle to glut their ferocity.

polle

The argument against political coercion is equally good against Its various the infliction of private penalties between mafter and flave, and fidered. between parent and child. There was in reality, not only more of gallantry, but more of reafon in the Gothic fystem of trial by duel, than in thefe. The trial of force is over in thefe, as we have already faid, before the exertion of force is begun. All that remains is the leifurely infliction of torture, my power to inflict it being placed in my joints and my finews. This whole argument may be fubjected to an irrefiftible dilemma. The right of the parent over his child lies either in his fuperior ftrength or his fuperior reafon. If in his ftrength, we have only to apply this right univerfally, in order to drive all morality out of the world. If in his reafon, in that reafon let him confide. It is a poor argument of my fuperior reafon, that I am unable to make juffice be apprehended and felt in the most neceffary cafes, without the intervention of blows.

Let us confider the effect that coercion produces upon the mind of him against whom it is employed. It cannot begin with convincing; it is no argument. It begins with producing claffes con-

the

GENERAL DISADVANTAGES OF COERCION.

BOOK VII. CHAP. II.

704

the fenfation of pain, and the fentiment of diffafte. It begins with violently alienating the mind from the truth with which we wifh it to be impreffed. It includes in it a tacit confeffion of imbecility. If he who employs coercion against me could mould me to his purposes by argument, no doubt he would. He pretends to punish me because his argument is important, but he really punishes me because his argument is weak.

[ 705 ]

CHAP. III.

OF THE PURPOSES OF COERCION

NATURE OF DEFENCE CONSIDERED .--- COERCION FOR RE-STRAINT --- FOR REFORMATION. --- SUPPOSED USES OF ADVERSITY - DEFECTIVE - UNNECESSARY. - COERCION FOR EXAMPLE- I. NUGATORY. -- THE NECESSITY OF POLITICAL COERCION ARISES FROM THE DEFECTS OF POLITICAL INSTITUTION. - 2. UNIUST. - UNFEELING CHARACTER OF THIS SPECIES OF COERCION.

DROCEED we to confider three principal ends that coercion BOOK VII. propofes to itfelf, reftraint, reformation and example. Under each of these heads the arguments on the affirmative fide must be allowed to be cogent, not irrefistible. Under each of them confiderations will occur, that will oblige us to doubt univerfally of the propriety of coercion. In this examination I shall take it for granted that the perfons with whom I am reafoning allow, that the ends of reftraint and example may be fufficiently answered in confistency with the end of reformation, that is, without the punifhment of death. To those by whom this is not allowed in the first instance, the fubfequent teafonings will only apply with additional force.

CHAP. III.

OF THE PURPOSES

BOOK VII. CHAP. III. Nature of

Nature of defence confidered.

The first and most innocent of all the classes of coercion is that which is employed in repelling actual force. This has but little to do with any fpecies of political inftitution, but may nevertheless deferve to be first confidered. In this case I am employed (fuppofe, for example, a drawn fword is pointed at my own breaft or that of another, with threats of inftant deftruction) in preventing a mifchief that feems about inevitably to enfue. In this cafe there appears to be no time for experiments. And yet even here meditation will not leave us without our difficulties. The powers of reafon and truth are yet unfathomed. That truth which one man cannot communicate in lefs than a year, another can communicate in a fortnight. The fhorteft term may have an understanding commenfurate to it. When Marius faid with a ftern look and a commanding countenance to the foldier that was fent down into his dungeon to affaffinate him, "Wretch, have you the temerity to kill Marius!" and with thefe few words drove him to flight; it was, that he had fo energetic an idea compressed in his mind, as to make its way with irrefiftible force to the mind of his executioner. If there were falfhood and prejudice mixed with this idea, can we believe that truth is not more powerful than they? It would be well for the human fpecies, if they were all in this refpect like Marius, all accuftomed to place an intrepid confidence in the fingle energy of intellect. Who shall fay what there is that would be impoffible to men with thefe habits? Who shall fay how far the whole species might be improved, б were were they accuftomed to defpife force in others, and did they BOOK VII. refufe to employ it for themfelves ?

But the coercion we are here confidering is exceedingly Coercion for refiraint : It is employed against an individual whose violence different. He is at prefent engaged in no hoftility against the is over. community or any of its members. He is quietly purfuing those occupations which are beneficial to himfelf, and injurious to none. Upon what pretence is this man to be the fubject of violence ? For reftraint ? Reftraint from what ? " From fome future injury which it is to be feared he will commit." This is the very argument which has been employed to juftify the moft execrable of all tyrannies. By what reafonings have the inquifition, the employment of fpies and the various kinds of public cenfure directed against opinion been vindicated ? Becaufe there is an intimate connexion between men's opinions and their conduct : becaufe immoral fentiments lead by a very probable confequence to immoral actions. There is not more reafon, in many cafes at leaft, to apprehend that the man who has once committed robbery will commit it again, than the man who diffipates his property at the gaming-table, or who is accuftomed to profefs that upon any emergency he will not fcruple to have recourfe to this expedient. Nothing can be more obvious than that, whatever precautions may be allowable with refpect to the future, juffice will reluctantly clafs among these precautions any

OF THE PURPOSES

BOOK VII. any violence to be committed on my neighbour. Nor are they CHAP. III. oftener unjuft than they are fuperfluous. Why not arm myfelf oftener unjuit than they are inperfuous. Why not arm mylelf with vigilance and energy, inftead of locking up every man whom my imagination may bid me fear, that I may fpend my days in undiffurbed inactivity? If communities, inftead of afpiring, as they have hitherto done, to embrace a vaft territory, and to glut their vanity with ideas of empire, were contented with a fmall diffrict with a provifo of confederation in cafes of neceffity, every individual would then live under the public eye, and the difapprobation of his neighbours, a fpecies of coercion, not derived from the caprice of men, but from the fyftem of the univerfe, would inevitably oblige him either to reform or to emigrate.—The fum of the argument under this head is, that all coercion for the fake of reftraint is punifhment upon fufpicion, a fpecies of punifhment, the moft abhorrent to reafon, and arbitrary in its application, that can be devifed.

for reforma-

The fecond object which coercion may be imagined to propofe to itfelf is reformation. We have already feen various objections that may be offered to it in this point of view. Coercion cannot convince, cannot conciliate, but on the contrary alienates the mind of him againft whom it is employed. Coercion has nothing in common with reafon, and therefore can have no proper tendency to the generation of virtue. Reafon is omnipotent: if my conduct be wrong, a very fimple flatement, flowing from a clear and comprehensive view, will make it appear to be fuch; nor is there any perverfencis that can BOOK VII. refift the evidence of which truth is capable.

iв

But to this it may be anfwered, "that this view of the fubject may indeed be abftractedly true, but that it is not true relative to the prefent imperfection of human faculties. The grand requifite for the reformation and improvement of the human fpecies, feems to confift in the roufing of the mind. It is for this reafon that the fchool of adverfity has fo often been confidered as the fchool of virtue. In an even courfe of eafy and profperous circumftances the faculties fleep. But, when great and urgent occafion is prefented, it fhould feem that the mind rifes to the level of the occafion. Difficulties awaken vigour and engender ftrength; and it will frequently happen that the more you check and opprefs me, the more will my faculties fwell, till they burft all the obftacles of opprefilon."

The opinion of the excellence of adverfity is built upon a very obvious miftake. If we will diveft ourfelves of paradox and fingularity, we fhall perceive that adverfity is a bad thing, but that there is fomething elfe that is worfe. Mind can neither exift nor be improved without the reception of ideas. It will improve more in a calamitous, than a torpid ftate. A man will fometimes be found wifer at the end of his career, who has been treated with feverity, than with neglect. But becaufe feverity is one way of generating thought, it does not follow that it is the beft.

Suppofed ufes of adverfity :

OF THE PURPOSES

BOOK VII. CHAP. III.

It has already been fhown that coercion abfolutely confidered is injuffice. Can injuffice be the beft mode of diffeminating principles of equity and reafon ? Oppreffion exercifed to a certain extent is the most ruinous of all things. What is it but this, that has habituated mankind to fo much ignorance and vice for fo many thoufand years? Can that which in its genuine and unlimited ftate is the worft, become by a certain modification and diluting the beft of all things? All coercion fours the mind. He that fuffers it, is practically perfuaded of the want of a philanthropy fufficiently enlarged in those with whom he is most intimately connected. He feels that juffice prevails only with great limitations, and that he cannot depend upon being treated with juffice. The leffon which coercion reads to him is, "Submit to force, and abjure reafon. Be not directed by the convictions of your underftanding, but by the bafeft part of your nature, the dread of prefent pain, and the pufillanimous terror of the injuffice of others." It was thus Elizabeth of England and Frederic of Pruffia were educated in the fchool of adverfity. The way in which they profited by this discipline was by finding refources in their own minds, enabling them to regard unmoved the violence that was employed against them. Can this be the best poffible mode of forming men to virtue? If it be, perhaps it is farther requisite that the coercion we use should be flagrantly unjust, fince the improvement feems to lie not in fubmiffion, but refiftance.

But

But it is certain that truth is adequate to awaken the mind without the aid of adverfity. Truth does not confift in a certain number of unconnected propositions, but in evidence that shows their reality and their value. If I apprehend the value of any purfuit, shall I not engage in it? If I apprehend it clearly, shall I not engage in it zealoufly? If you would awaken my mind in the most effectual manner, tell me the truth with energy. For that purpofe, thoroughly underftand it yourfelf, impregnate your mind with its evidence, and fpeak from the clearnefs of your view, and the fulness of conviction. Were we accustomed to an education, in which truth was never neglected from indolence, or told in a way treacherous to its excellence, in which the preceptor fubjected himfelf to the perpetual difcipline of finding the way to communicate it with brevity and force, but without prejudice and acrimony, it cannot be doubted, but fuch an education would be much more effectual for the improvement of the mind, than all the modes of angry or benevolent coercion that can be devifed.

The laft object which coercion propofes is example. Had le- Coercion for giflators confined their views to reformation and reftraint, their exertions of power, though miftaken, would ftill have borne the ftamp of humanity. But, the moment vengeance prefented itfelf as a ftimulus on the one fide, or the exhibition of a terrible example on the other, no barbarity was then thought too great. Ingenious cruelty was bufied to find new means of torturing the victim, or of rendering the fpectacle impreflive and horrible.

711

CHAP. III. unneceffary.

BOOK VII.

It

example :

OF THE PURPOSES OF

BOOK VII. CHAP. III.

It has long fince been observed that this fystem of policy conftantly fails of its purpofe. Farther refinements in barbarity produce a certain impreffion fo long as they are new, but this impreffion foon vanishes, and the whole fcope of a gloomy invention is exhaufted in vain *. The reafon of this phenomenon is that, whatever may be the force with which novelty ftrikes the imagination, the unchangeable principles of reafon fpeedily recur, and affert their indeftructible empire. We feel the emergencies to which we are exposed, and we feel, or we think we feel, the dictates of truth directing to their relief. Whatever ideas we form in opposition to the mandates of law, we draw, with fincerity, though it may be with fome mixture of miftake, from the unalterable conditions of our existence. We compare them with the defpotifm which fociety exercifes in its corporate capacity, and the more frequent is our comparison, the greater are our murmurs and indignation against the injustice to which we are exposed. But indignation is not a fentiment that conciliates; barbarity poffeffes none of the attributes of perfuafion. It may terrify; but it cannot produce in us candour and docility. Thus ulcerated with injuffice, our diftreffes, our temptations, and all the eloquence of feeling prefent themfelves again and again. Is it any wonder they fhould prove victorious?

The neceffity of political coercion arifes from the defects of political inftitution.

of human fociety, if we recollect that the evils which they thus * Beccaria, Dei Delitti e delle Pene.

With what repugnance fhall we contemplate the prefent forms mercilefsly

mercilefsly avenge, owe their existence to the vices of those very BOOK VII. forms? It is a well known principle of fpeculative truth, that true felf love and focial prefcribe to us exactly the fame fpecies of conduct *. Why is this acknowledged in fpeculation and perpetually contradicted in practice? Is there any innate perverfenefs in man that continually hurries him to his own deftruction? This is impoffible; for man is thought, and, till thought began, he had no propenfities either to good or evil. My propenfities are the fruit of the impreffions that have been made upon me, the good always preponderating, becaufe the inherent nature of things is more powerful than any human inflitutions. The original fin of the worft men, is in the perverseness of these inftitutions, the opposition they produce between public and private good, the monopoly they create of advantages which reafon directs to be left in common. What then can be more fhamelefs than for fociety to make an example of those whom she has goaded to the breach of order, inftead of amending her own inflitutions, which, by ftraining order into tyranny, produced the mifchief? Who can tell how rapid would be our progrefs towards the total annihilation of civil delinquency, if we did but enter upon the bufinefs of reform in the right manner ?

Coercion for example, is liable to all the fame objections as 2. unjuft. coercion for reftraint or reformation, and to certain other objections peculiar to itfelf. It is employed against a performation not

> * Book IV, Chap. IX. 4 Y now

OF THE PURPOSES OF COERCION.

Unfeeling character of coercion.

now in the commission of offence, and of whom we can only fufpect that he ever will offend. It fuperfedes argument, reafon and conviction, and requires us to think fuch a fpecies of conduct our duty, becaufe fuch is the good pleafure of our fuperiors, and becaufe, as we are taught by the example in queftion, they will make us rue our stubbornness if we think otherwise. In addition this forcies of to this it is to be remembered that, when I am made to fuffer as an example to others, I am treated myfelf with fupercilious neglect, as if I were totally incapable of feeling and morality. If you inflict pain upon me, you are either just or unjust. If you be juft, it fhould feem neceffary that there fhould be fomething in me that makes me the fit fubject of pain, either defert, which is abfurd, or milchief I may be expected to perpetrate, or laftly a tendency to reformation. If any of these be the reason why the fuffering I undergo is just, then example is out of the question : it may be an incidental confequence of the procedure, but it can form no part of its principle. It must furely be a very inartificial and injudicious fcheme for guiding the fentiments of mankind; to fix upon an individual as a fubject of torture or death, refpecting whom this treatment has no direct fitnefs, merely that we may bid others look on, and derive inftruction from his mifery. This argument will derive additional force from the reafonings of the following chapter.

714

BOOK VII.

CHAP. III.

F. 715 1

CHAP. IV.

OF THE APPLICATION OF COERCION.

DELINQUENCY AND COERCION INCOMMENSURABLE-EX-TERNAL ACTION NO PROPER SUBJECT OF CRIMINAL ANI-MADVERSION-HOW FAR CAPABLE OF PROOF.-INIQUITY OF THIS STANDARD IN A MORAL-AND IN A POLITICAL VIEW .---- PROPRIETY OF A RETRIBUTION TO BE MEASURED BY THE INTENTION OF THE OFFENDER CONSIDERED. SUCH A PROJECT WOULD OVERTURN CRIMINAL LAW-WOULD ABOLISH COERCION .- INSCRUTABILITY, I. OF MOTIVES-DOUBTFULNESS OF HISTORY-DECLARATIONS OF SUFFERERS .---- 2. OF THE FUTURE CONDUCT OF THE OFFENDER-UNCERTAINTY OF EVIDENCE-EITHER OF THE FACTS-OR THE INTENTION .- DISADVANTAGES OF THE DEFENDANT IN A CRIMINAL SUIT.

FARTHER confideration, calculated to flow, not only BOOK VII. the abfurdity of coercion for example, but the iniquity of coercion in general, is, that delinquency and coercion are in all and coercion cafes incommenfurable. No ftandard of delinquency ever has furable. been or ever can be discovered. No two crimes were ever alike; 4 Y 2 and

CHAP. IV. Delinguency incommen-

OF THE APPLICATION

BOOK VII. and therefore the reducing them explicitly or implicitly to gene-CHAP. IV. ral claffes, which the very idea of example implies, is abfurd. Nor is it lefs abfurd to attempt to proportion the degree of fuffering to the degree of delinquency, when the latter can never be difcovered. Let us endeavour to clear in the moft fatisfactory manner the truth of thefe propositions.

External action no proper fubject of eriminal animadverfion :

Man, like every other machine the operations of which can be made the object of our fenfes, may be faid, relatively, not abfolutely fpeaking, to confift of two parts, the external and the internal. The form which his actions affume is one thing; the principle from which they flow is another. With the former it is poffible we fhould be acquainted; refpecting the latter there is no fpecies of evidence that can adequately inform us. Shall we proportion the degree of fuffering to the former or the latter, to the injury fultained by the community, or to the quantity of ill intention conceived by the offender? Some philosophers, fensible of the inferutability of intention, have declared in favour of our attending to nothing but the injury fuftained. The humane and benevolent Beccaria has treated this as a truth of the utmost importance, " unfortunately neglected by the majority of political inftitutors, and preferved only in the dispaffionate speculation of philofophers *."

* " Questa è una di quelle palpabili verità, che per una maravigliosa combinazione di circostanze non sono con decisa sicurezza conosciute, che da alcuni pochi pensatori uomini d' ogni nazione, e d'ogni secolo." Dei Delitti e delle Pene.

It is true that we may in many inftances be tolerably informed BOOK VIL. respecting external actions, and that there will at first fight appear to be no great difficulty in reducing them to general ble of proof. rules. Murder, according to this fystem, will be the exertion of any species of action affecting my neighbour, so as that the confequences terminate in death. The difficulties of the magistrate are much abridged upon this principle, though they are by no means annihilated. It is well known how many fubtle difquifitions, ludicrous or tragical according to the temper with which we view them, have been introduced to determine in each particular inftance, whether the action were or were not the real occasion of the death. It never can be demonstrativelyafcertained.

But, difmiffing this difficulty, how complicated is the iniquity Iniquity of of treating all inftances alike, in which one man has occasioned the in a moral: death of another? Shall we abolifh the imperfect diffinctions. which the most odious tyrannies have hitherto thought themfelves compelled to admit, between chance medley, manflaughter and malice prepenfe? Shall we inflict on the man who, in endeavouring to fave the life of a drowning fellow creature, overfets a boat and occafions the death of a fecond, the fame fuffering, as on him who from gloomy and vicious habits is incited to the murder of his benefactor ? In reality the injury and in a polifuftained by the community is by no means the fame in thefe two cafes; the injury fuftained by the community is to be meafured.

CHAP. IV. how far capa-

this flandard

tical view,

OF THE APPLICATION

BOOK VII, meafured by the antifocial difpolitions of the offender, and, if CHAP. IV. that were the right view of the fubject, by the encouragement afforded to fimilar dispositions from his impunity. But this leads us at once from the external action to the unlimited confideration of the intention of the actor. The iniquity of the written laws of fociety is of precifely the fame nature, though not of fo atrocious a degree, in the confusion they actually introduce between varied intentions, as if this confusion were unlimited. The delinquencies recited upon a former occafion, of "one man that commits murder, to remove a troublefome obferver of his depraved difpolitions, who will otherwife counteract and expose him to the world; a fecond, because he cannot bear the ingenuous fincerity with which he is told of his vices; a third, from his intolerable envy of fuperior merit; a fourth, becaufe he knows that his adverfary meditates an act pregnant with extensive mischief, and perceives no other mode by which its perpetration can be prevented; a fifth, in defence of his father's life or his daughter's chaftity; and any of thefe, either from momentary impulfe, or any of the infinite shades of deliberation *;"-are delinquencies all of them unequal, and entitled to a very different cenfure in the court of reafon. Can a fystem that levels these inequalities, and confounds these differences, be productive of good? That we may render men beneficent towards each other, fhall we fubvert the very nature * Book II, Chap. VI, p. 131.

718

of

of right and wrong ? Or is not this fyftem, from whatever pre- BOOK VII. tences introduced, calculated in the most powerful manner to produce general injury? Can there be a more flagrant injury than to inferibe as we do in effect upon our courts of judgment, "This is the Hall of Juffice, in which the principles of right and wrong are daily and fystematically flighted, and offences of a thousand different magnitudes are confounded together, by the infolent fupineness of the legislator, and the unfeeling felfishnefs of those who have engroffed the produce of the general labour to their fole emolument !"

But fuppofe, fecondly, that we were to take the intention of Propriety of the offender, and the future injury to be apprehended, as the to be meastandard of infliction. This would no doubt be a confiderable intention of improvement. This would be the true mode of reconciling confidered. coercion and juffice, if for reafons already affigned they were not in their own nature incompatible. It is earneftly to be defired that this mode of administring retribution should be ferioufly attempted. It is to be hoped that men will one day attempt to eftablish an accurate criterion, and not go on for ever, as they have hitherto done, with a fovereign contempt of equity and reafon. This attempt would lead by a very obvious procefs to the abolition of all coercion.

It would immediately lead to the abolition of all criminal law. Such a pro-An enlightened and reafonable judicature would have recourfe, overturn criin order to decide upon the caufe before them, to no code but a retribution fored by the the offender

CHAP. IV.

OF THE APPLICATION

the code of reafon. They would feel the abfurdity of other BOOK VII. CHAP. IV. men's teaching them what they fhould think, and pretending to understand the cafe before it happened, better than they who had all the circumstances of the case under their inspection. They would feel the abfurdity of bringing every error to be compared with a certain number of measures previously invented, and compelling it to agree with one of them. But we shall fhortly have occasion to return to this topic *.

would abolifh coercion.

1. of motives.

720

The greatest advantage that would refult from men's determining to govern themfelves in the fuffering to be inflicted by the motives of the offender and the future injury to be apprehended, would confift in their being taught how vain and iniquitous it is in them to attempt to wield the rod of retribution. Who is it that in his fober reafon will pretend to affign Inferutability the motives that influenced me in any article of my conduct, and upon them to found a grave, perhaps a capital, penalty againft me? The attempt would be prefumptuous and abfurd, even though the individual who was to judge me, had made the longest observation of my character, and been most intimately acquainted with the feries of my actions. How often does a man deceive himfelf in the motives of his conduct, and affign it to one principle when it in reality proceeds from another? Can we expect that a mere fpectator should form a judgment fufficiently correct, when he who has all the fources of information in his hands, is neverthele's miftaken? Is it not to this hour a difpute among philofophers whether I be capable of doing good to my neighbour for his own fake? "To afcertain the intention of a man it is neceffary to be precifely informed of the actual imprefion of the objects upon his fenfes, and of the previous difpolition of his mind, both of which vary in different perfons, and even in the fame perfon at different times, with a rapidity commenfurate to the fucceffion of ideas, paffions and circum-ftances *." Meanwhile the individuals, whofe office it is to judge of this inferutable myftery, are poffeffed of no previous knowledge, utter ftrangers to the perfon accufed, and collecting their only lights from the information of two or three ignorant and prejudiced witneffes.

* Chap. VIII.

What a vaft train of actual and poffible motives enter into the hiftory of a man, who has been incited to defiroy the life of another? Can you tell how much in these there was of apprehended juffice and how much of inordinate selfishness? how much of fudden passion, and how much of rooted depravity? how much of intolerable provocation, and how much of spontaneous wrong? how much of that fudden infanity which * " Questa [l'intenzione] dipende dalla impreffione attuale degli oggetti, et dalla precedente difposizione della mente : effe variano in tutti gli uomini e in ciascun uomo colla velociffima successione delle idee, delle passioni, e delle circostanze." He adds, " Sarebbe dunque necessioni formare non folo un codice particolare per ciascun cittadino, ma una nuova legge ad ogni delitto."

4Z

BOOK VII. CHAP. IV.

OF THE APPLICATION

BOOK VII. CHAP. IV.

doubtfulnefs of hiftory :

declarations of fufferers. hurries the mind into a certain action by a fort of incontinence of nature almost without any affignable motive, and how much of incurable habit ? Confider the uncertainty of hiftory. Do we not ftill difpute whether Cicero were more a vain or a virtucus man, whether the heroes of ancient Rome were impelled by vain glory or difinterefted benevolence, whether Voltaire were the flain of his fpecies, or their most generous and intrepid benefactor? Upon these subjects moderate men perpetually quote upon us the impenetrableness of the human heart. Will moderate men pretend that we have not an hundred times more evidence upon which to found our judgment in these cases, than in that of the man who was tried laft week at the Old Bailey ? This part of the fubject will be put in a ftriking light, if we recollect the narratives that have been written by condemned criminals. In how different a light do they place the transactions that proved fatal to them, from the conftruction that was put upon them by their judges? And yet thefe narratives were written under the moft awful circumftances, and many of them without the leaft hope of mitigating their fate, and with marks of the deepeft fincerity. Who will fay that the judge with his flender pittance of information was more competent to decide upon the motives, than the prifoner after the feverest fcrutiny of his own mind? How few are the trials which an humane and a just man can read, terminating in a verdict of guilty, without feeling an uncontrolable repugnance against the verdict? If there be any fight more humiliating than all others, it is that of a miferable a milerable victim acknowledging the justice of a fentence, BOOK VII. CHAP. 1V. against which every enlightened reasoner exclaims with horror.

But this is not all. The motive, when afcertained, is only 2. of the fu-ture conduct a fubordinate part of the queftion. The point upon which only of the cherk fociety can equitably animadvert, if it had any jurifdiction in the cafe, is a point, if poffible, ftill more inferutable than that of which we have been treating. A legal inquifition into the minds of men, confidered by itfelf, all rational enquirers have agreed to condemn. What we want to afcertain is, not the intention of the offender, but the chance of his offending again. For this purpofe we reafonably enquire first into his intention. But, when we have found this, our tafk is but begun. This is one of our materials, to enable us to calculate the probability of his repeating his offence, or being imitated by others. Was this an habitual state of his mind, or was it a crifis in his history likely to remain an unique? What effect has experience produced on him, or what likelihood is there that the uncafinefs and fuffering that attend the perpetration of eminent wrong may have worked a falutary change in his mind? Will he hereafter be placed in circumstances that shall propel him to the fameenormity? Precaution is in the nature of things a ftep in the higheft degree precarious. Precaution that confifts in inflicting; injury on another, will at all times be odious to an equitable Meanwhile be it obferved, that all which has been faid. mind. upon the uncertainty of crime, tends to aggravate the injuffice:

of the of-

4Z2

BOOK VIL. of coercion for the fake of example. Since the crime upon CHAP. IV. which I animadvert in one man can never be the fame as the crime of another, it is as if I fhould award a grievous penalty againft perfons with one eye, to prevent any man in future from putting out his eyes by defign.

Uncertainty of evidence :

either of the facts :

One more argument calculated to prove the abfurdity of the attempt to proportion delinquency and fuffering to each other may be derived from the imperfection of evidence. The veracity of witneffes will be to an impartial fpectator a fubject of continual doubt. Their competence, fo far as relates to just observation and accuracy of understanding, will be still more doubtful. Abfolute impartiality it would be abfurd to expect from them. How much will every word and every action come difforted by the medium through which it is transmitted? The guilt of a man, to fpeak in the phrafeology of law, may be proved either by direct or circumstantial evidence. I am found near to the body of a man newly murdered. I come out of his apartment with a bloody knife in my hand or with blood upon my clothes. If, under these circumstances and unexpectedly charged with murder, I falter in my fpeech or betray perturbation in my countenance, this is an additional proof. Who does not know that there is not a man in England, however blamelefs a life he may lead, who is fecure that he shall not end it at the gallows? This is one of the most obvious and universal bleffings that civil government has to beftow. In what is called direct direct evidence, it is neceffary to identify the perfon of the offender. BOOK VIL How many inftances are there upon record of perfons condemned upon this evidence, who after their death have been proved entirely innocent? Sir Walter Raleigh, when a prifoner in the Tower, heard fome high words accompanied with blows under his window. He enquired of feveral eye witneffes who entered his apartment in fucceffion, into the nature of the transaction. But the flory they told varied in fuch material circumftances. that he could form no just idea of what had been done. He applied this to prove the vanity of hiftory. The parallel would have been more firiking if he had applied it to criminal fuits.

But fuppoling the external action, the first part of the question or the intento be afcertained, we have next to difcover through the fame garbled and confused medium the intention. How few men should I choose to entrust with the drawing up a narrative of fome delicate and interefting transaction of my life? How few, though, corporally speaking, they were witness of what was done, would juftly defcribe my motives, and properly report and interpret my words? And yet in an affair, that involves my life, my fame and my future usefulness, I am obliged to truft to any vulgar and cafual obferver.

A man properly confident in the force of truth, would con- Difadvantages fider a public libel upon his character as a trivial misfortune. But ant in a cria criminal trial in a court of juffice is inexpreffibly different. Few of the defendminal fuit.

men, tion.

CHAP. IV.

OF THE APPLICATION OF COERCION.

CHAP. IV.

726

BOOK VII. men, thus circumftanced, can retain the neceffary prefence of mind and freedom from embarrassiment. But, if they do, it is with a cold and unwilling ear that their tale is heard. If the crime charged against them be atrocious, they are half condemned in the paffions of mankind, before their caufe is brought to a trial. All that is interefting to them is decided amidft the first burft of indignation; and it is well if their ftory be impartially eftimated, ten years after their body has mouldered in the grave. Why, if a confiderable time elapfe between the trial and the execution, do we find the feverity of the public changed into compaffion ? For the fame reafon that a mafter, if he do not beat his flave in the moment of refentment, often feels a repugnance to the beating him at all. Not fo much, as is commonly fuppofed. from forgetfulnels of the offence, as that the fentiments of reafon have time to recur, and he feels in a confused and indefinite manner the injuffice of coercion. Thus every confideration tends to fhow, that a man tried for a crime is a poor deferted individual with the whole force of the community confpiring his ruin. The culprit that efcapes, however confcious of innocence, lifts up his hands with aftonifhment, and can fcarcely believe his fenfes. having fuch mighty odds against him. It is easy for a man who defires to thake off an imputation under which he labours, to talk of being put on his trial; but no man ever ferioufly withed for this ordeal, who knew what a trial was.

727 ]

CHAP. V.

OF COERCION CONSIDERED AS A TEMPORARY EXPEDIENT.

ARGUMENTS IN ITS FAVOUR. --- ANSWER. --- IT CANNOT FIT MEN FOR A BETTER ORDER OF SOCIETY .- THE TRUE REMEDY TO PRIVATE INJUSTICE DESCRIBED -IS ADAPTED TO IMMEDIATE PRACTICE .--- DUTY OF THE COMMUNITY IN THIS RESPECT, -- DUTY OF INDIVIDUALS. -- ILLUSTRA-TION FROM THE CASE OF WAR-OF INDIVIDUAL DE-FENCE. --- APPLICATION, --- DISADVANTAGES OF ANARCHY -WANT OF SECURITY-OF PROGRESSIVE ENQUIRY .--CORRESPONDENT DISADVANTAGES OF DESPOTISM. ----ANARCHY AWAKENS, DESPOTISM DEPRESSES THE MIND. -FINAL RESULT OF ANARCHY-HOW DETERMINED .---SUPPOSED PURPOSES OF COERCION IN A TEMPORARY VIEW. - REFORMATION - EXAMPLE - RESTRAINT. ----CONCLUSION.

THUS much for the general merits of coercion confidered BOOK VII. as an inftrument to be applied in the government of men. It is time that we fhould enquire into the arguments by which it may be apologifed as a temporary expedient. No introduction feemed

CHAP. V.

BOOK VII. feemed more proper to this enquiry than fuch a review of the fubject upon a comprehensive fcale; that the reader might be infpired with a fuitable repugnance against fo pernicious a fystem, and prepared firmly to refiss admission in all cases where its neceffity cannot be clearly demonstrated.

Arguments in its favour. The arguments in favour of coercion as a temporary expedient are obvious. It may be alledged that, "however fuitable an entire immunity in this refpect may be to the nature of mind abfolutely confidered, it is impracticable with regard to men as we now find them. The human fpecies is at prefent infected with a thousand vices, the offspring of established injuffice. They are full of factitious appetites and perverse habits : headftrong in evil, inveterate in felfishness, without fympathy and forbearance for the welfare of others. In time they may become accommodated to the leffons of reason; but at prefent they would be found deaf to her mandates, and eager to commit every speeies of injuffice."

Anfwer.

It cannot fit men for a better order of fociety. One of the remarks that most irrefiftibly fuggest themselves upon this flatement is, that coercion has no proper tendency to prepare men for a flate in which coercion shall cease. It is abfurd to expect that force should begin to do that which it is the office of truth to finish, should fit men by feverity and violence to enter with more favourable auspices into the schools of reason.

But,

But, to omit this grofs mifreprefentation in behalf of the fup- BOOK VII. pofed utility of coercion, it is of importance in the first place to observe that there is a complete and unanfwerable remedy to those medy to prievils the cure of which has hitherto been fought in coercion, that deferibed; is within the reach of every community whenever they shall be perfuaded to adopt it. There is a flate of fociety, the outline of which has been already fketched *, that by the mere fimplicity of its ftructure would infallibly lead to the extermination of offence : a ftate, in which temptation would be almost unknown, truth brought down to the level of all apprehenfions, and vice fufficiently checked by the general difcountenance and fober condemnation of every fpectator. Such are the confequences that would neceffarily fpring from an abolition of the craft and myftery of governing; while on the other hand the innumerable murders that are daily committed under the fanction of legal forms. are folely to be afcribed to the pernicious notion of an extensive territory; to the dreams of glory, empire and national greatnefs. which have hitherto proved the bane of the human fpecies, without producing folid benefit and happinefs to a fingle individual.

Another observation which this confideration immediately is adapted to fuggefts, is, that it is not, as the objection fuppoied, by any practice. means neceffary, that mankind fhould pafs through a flate of purification, and be freed from the vicious propenfities which

CHAP. V. vate injultice

immediate

* Book V; Chap. XXII, p. 565. 5 A ill

730

CHAP. V.

ill conflituted governments have implanted, before they can be BOOK VII. difmiffed from the coercion to which they are at prefent fubjected. In that cafe their state would indeed be hopelefs, if it were neceffary that the cure fhould be effected, before we were at liberty to difcard those practices to which the difease owes its most alarming symptoms. But it is the characteristic of a well formed fociety, not only to maintain in its members those virtues with which they are already indued, but to extirpate their errors, and render them benevolent and just to each other. It frees us from the influence of those phantoms which before milled us. fhows us our true advantage as confifting in independence and integrity, and binds us by the general confent of our fellow citizens to the dictates of reafon, more ftrongly than with fetters of iron. It is not to the found of intellectual health that the remedy fo urgently addreffes itfelf, as to those who are infected with difeases of the mind. The ill propenfities of mankind no otherwife tend to postpone the abolition of coercion, than as they prevent them from perceiving the advantages of political fimplicity. The moment in which they can be perfuaded to adopt any rational plan for this abolition, is the moment in which the abolition ought to be effected.

Duty of the community in this refpect.

A farther confequence that may be deduced from the principles that have here been delivered, is that coercion of a domeftic kind can in no cafe be the duty of the community. The community is always competent to change its inftitutions, and thus to extirpate offence in in a way infinitely more rational and just than that of coercion. BOOK VIL If in this fense coercion has been deemed neceffary as a temporary expedient, the opinion admits of fatisfactory refutation. Coercion can at no time, either permanently or provisionally, make part of any political fystem that is built upon the principles of reason.

AS A TEMPORARY EXPEDIENT.

But, though in this fenfe coercion cannot be admitted fo much Duty of indias a temporary expedient, there is another fenfe in which it muft be fo admitted. Coercion exercifed in the name of the ftate upon its refpective members cannot be the duty of the community; but coercion may be the duty of individuals within the community. The duty of individuals is, in the first place, to difplay with all poffible perfpicuity the advantages of an improved flate of fociety, and to be indefatigable in detecting the imperfections of the conftitution under which they live. But, in the fecond place, it behoves them to recollect, that their efforts cannot be expected to meet with inftant fuccefs, that the progrefs of knowledge has in all cafes been gradual, and that their obligation to promote the welfare of fociety during the intermediate period is not lefs real, than their obligation to promote its future and permanent advantage. In reality the future advantage cannot be effectually procured, if we be inattentive to the prefent fecurity. But, as long as nations shall be fo far mistaken as to endure a complex government and an extensive territory, coercion will be indifpenfibly neceffary to general fecurity. It is therefore the duty of individuals to take an active fhare upon occasion, in.

viduals.

5 A 2

fo

BOOK VII. fo much coercion, and in fuch parts of the exifting fyftem, as CHAP.V. fhall be fufficient to prevent the inroad of universal violence and tumult. It is unworthy of a rational enquirer to fay, "these things are neceffary, but I am not obliged to take my fhare in them." If they be neceffary, they are neceffary for the general good; of confequence are virtuous, and what no just man will refuse to perform.

Illustration from the cafe

The duty of individuals is in this respect fimilar to the duty of independent communities upon the fubject of war. It is well known what has been the prevailing policy of princes under this head. Princes, efpecially the most active and enterprifing among them, are feized with an inextinguishable rage for augmenting their dominions. The most innocent and inoffenfive conduct on the part of their neighbours is an infufficient fecurity against their ambition. They indeed feek to difguife their violence under plaufible pretences; but it is well known that, where no fuch pretences occur, they are not on that account disposed to drop their purfuit. Let us fuppofe then a land of freemen invaded by one of these despots. What conduct does it behave them to adopt? We are not yet wife enough to make the fword drop out of the hands of our oppreffors by the mere force of reafon. Were we refolved. like quakers, neither to oppofe nor obey them, much bloodfhed might perhaps he avoided : but a more lafting evil would refult. They would fix garrifons in our country, and torment us with perpetual perpetual injuffice. Supposing even it were granted that, if the BOOK VIL invaded nation should conduct itself with unalterable constancy upon the principles of reason, the invaders would become tired of their fruitless usurpation, it would prove but little. At prefent we have to do, not with nations of philosophers, but with nations of men whofe virtues are alloyed with weaknefs, fluctuation and inconftancy. At prefent it is our duty to confult refpecting the procedure which to fuch nations would be attended with the most favourable refult. It is therefore proper that we should choofe the leaft calamitous mode of obliging the enemy fpeedily to withdraw himfelf from our territories.

732

AS A TEMPORARY EXPEDIENT.

The cafe of individual defence is of the fame nature. It does of individual defence. not appear that any advantage can refult from my forbearance, adequate to the difadvantages of my fuffering my own life or that of another, a peculiarly valuable member of the community as it may happen, to become a prey to the first ruffian who inclines to deftroy it. Forbearance in this cafe will be the conduct of a fingular individual, and its effect may very probably be trifling. Hence it appears, that I ought to arreft the villain in the execution of his defigns, though at the expence of a certain degree of coercion.

The cafe of an offender, who appears to be hardened in guilt, Application. and to trade in the violation of focial fecurity, is clearly parallel to thefe. I ought to take up arms against the defpot by whom my country

CHAP.

CHAP. V.

734

BOOK VII. country is invaded, becaufe my capacity does not enable me by arguments to prevail on him to defift, and becaufe my countrymen will not preferve their intellectual independence in the midft of oppression. For the same reason I ought to take up arms against the domestic spoiler, because I am unable either to perfuade him to defift, or the community to adopt a just political inftitution, by means of which fecurity might be maintained confiftently with the abolition of coercion.

> To understand the full extent of this duty it is incumbent upon us to remark that anarchy as it is usually underflood, and a well conceived form of fociety without government, are exceedingly different from each other. If the government of Great Britain were diffolved to-morrow, unless that diffolution were the refult of confistent and digested views of political justice previoully diffeminated among the inhabitants, it would be very farfrom leading to the abolition of violence. Individuals, freed from the terrors by which they had been accuftomed to be reftrained. and not yet placed under the happier and more rational reftraint . of public infpection, or convinced of the wifdom of reciprocal forbearance, would break out into acts of injuffice, while other individuals, who defired only that this irregularity fhould ceafe, would find themfelves obliged to affociate for its forcible fuppreffion. We fhould have all the evils attached to a regular government, at the fame time that we were deprived of that tranquillity and leifure which are its only advantages.

AS A TEMPORARY EXPEDIENT.

It may not be useles in this place to confider more accurately BOOK VII. than we have hitherto done the evils of anarchy. Such a review will afford us a criterion by which to difcern, as well the comparative value of different inflitutions, as the precife degree of coercion which must be employed for the exclusion of universal violence and tumult.

Anarchy in its own nature is an evil of fhort duration. The want of femore horrible are the mifchiefs it inflicts, the more does it haften to a close. But it is nevertheless necessary that we should confider both what is the quantity of mifchief it produces in a given period, and what is the fcene in which it promifes to clofe. The first victim that is facrificed at its fhrine is perfonal fecurity. Every man who has a fecret foe, ought to dread the dagger of that foe. There is no doubt that in the worft anarchy multitudes of men will fleep in happy obfcurity. But woe to him who by whatever means excites the envy, the jealoufy or the fufpicion of his neighbour! Unbridled ferocity inftantly marks him for its prey. This is indeed the principal evil of fuch a ftate, that the wifeft, the brighteft, the most generous and bold will often be most exposed to an immature fate. fuch a ftate we must bid farewel to the patient lucubrations of the philosopher and the labour of the midnight oil. All is here, like the fociety in which it exifts, impatient and headlong. Mind will frequently burft forth, but its appearance will be like the corrufcations of the meteor, not like the mild illumination of curity:

CHAP.V Difadvananarchy :

In of progreffive enquiry.

the

BOOK VII. CHAP. V.

736

the fun. Men, who ftart forth into fudden energy, will refemble in temper the ftate that brought them to this unlooked for greatnefs. They will be rigorous, unfeeling and fierce; and their ungoverned paffions will often not ftop at equality, but incite them to grafp at power.

Correfpondent difadvantages of defpotifm.

With all thefe evils, we must not hastily conclude, that the mifchiefs of anarchy are worfe than those which government is qualified to produce. With refpect to perfonal fecurity anarchy is certainly not worfe than defpotifm, with this difference that despotifm is as perennial as anarchy is transitory. Despotifm, as it exifted under the Roman emperors, marked out wealth for its victim, and the guilt of being rich never failed to convict the accufed of every other crime. This defpotifm continued for centuries. Defpotifm, as it has exifted in modern Europe, has been ever full of jealoufy and intrigue, a tool to the rage of courtiers and the refertment of women. He that dared utter a word against the tyrant, or endeavour to instruct his countrymen in their interefts; was never fecure that the next moment would not conduct him to a dungeon. Here defpotifm wreaked her vengeance at leifure, and forty years of mifery and folitude were fometimes infufficient to fatiate her fury. Nor was this all. An usurpation that defied all the rules of justice, was obliged to purchase its own fafety by affifting tyranny through all its fubordinate ranks. Hence the rights of nobility, of feudal vaffalage, of primogeniture, of fines and inheritance. When the philofophy τ philofophy of law fhall be properly underftood, the true key to BOOK VII. its fpirit and its hiftory will be found, not, as fome men have CHAP. V. fondly imagined, in a defire to fecure the happinefs of mankind, but in the venal compact by which fuperior tyrants have purchafed the countenance and alliance of the inferior.

 $t_{\rm c}$

There is one point remaining in which anarchy and defpotifin are ftrongly contrafted with each other. Anarchy awakens mind, diffuses energy and enterprize through the community, mind, though it does not effect this in the beft manner, as its fruits, forced into ripenefs, muft not be expected to have the vigorous stamina of true excellence. But in defpotifm mind is trampled into an equality of the most odious fort. Every thing that promifes greatness is defined to fall under the exterminating hand of fufpicion and envy. In defpotifm there is no encouragement to excellence. Mind delights to expatiate in a field where every fpecies of eminence is within its reach. A fcheme of policy, under which all men are fixed in claffes or levelled with the duft. affords it no encouragement to enter on its career. The inhabitants of fuch countries are but a more vicious fpecies of brutes. Oppreffion ftimulates them to mifchief and piracy, and fuperior force of mind often difplays itfelf only in deeper treachery or more daring injuffice.

One of the moft interefting queftions in relation to anarchy is Final refut. 5 B that Anarchy awakens, defpotifm depreffes the mind.

BOOK VII. that of the manner in which it may be expected to terminate. CHAP. V. The poffibilities as to this termination are as wide as the various fchemes of fociety which the human imagination can conceive. Anarchy may and has terminated in defpotifm; and in that cafe the introduction of anarchy will only ferve to afflict us with variety of evils. It may lead to a modification of defpotilin, a milder and more equitable government than that which has gone before. And it does not feem impoffible that it fhould lead to the beft form of human fociety, that the moft penetrating philofopher is able to conceive. Nay, it has fomething in it that fuggefts the likenefs, a difforted and tremendous likenefs, of true liberty. Anarchy has commonly been generated by the hatred of oppreffion. It is accompanied with a fpirit of independence. It difengages men from prejudice and implicit faith, and in a certain degree incites them to an impartial fcrutiny into the reafon of their actions.

how determined. The fcene in which anarchy fhall terminate principally depends upon the flate of mind by which it has been preceded. All mankind were in a flate of anarchy, that is, without government, previoufly to their being in a flate of policy. It would not be difficult to find in the hiftory of almost every country a period of anarchy. The people of England were in a flate of anarchy immediately before the Reftoration. The Roman people were in a flate of anarchy at the moment of their feceffion to the Sacred Mountain. Hence it follows that anarchy is neither neither fo good nor fo ill a thing in relation to its confequences, BOOK VII. as it has fometimes been reprefented.

738

It is not reafonable to expect that a fhort period of anarchy fhould do the work of a long period of invefligation and philofophy. When we fay, that it difengages men from prejudice and implicit faith, this muft be underflood with much allowance. It tends to loofen the hold of thefe vermin upon the mind, but it does not inftantly convert ordinary men into philofophers. Some prejudices, that were never fully incorporated with the intellectual habit, it deftroys; but other prejudices it arms with fury, and converts into inftruments of vengeance.

Little good can be expected from any fpecies of anarchy that fhould fubfift for inftance among American favages. In order to anarchy being rendered a feed plot of future juffice, reflexion and enquiry muft have gone before, the regions of philofophy muft have been penetrated, and political truth have opened her fchool to mankind. It is for this reafon that the revolutions of the prefent age (for every total revolution is a fpecies of anarchy) promife much happier effects than the revolutions of any former period. For the fame reafon the more anarchy can be held at bay, the more fortunate will it be for mankind. Falthood may gain by precipitating the crifis; but a genuine and enlightened philanthropy will wait with unaltered patience for the harveft of inftruction. The arrival of that harveft may be flow, but it

BOOK VII. CHAP. V. is infallible. If vigilance and wifdom be fuccefsful in their prefent opposition to anarchy, every benefit will be ultimately obtained, untarnished with violence, and unstained with blood.

Thefe obfervations are calculated to lead us to an accurate f effimate of the mifchiefs of anarchy, and prove that there are forms of coercion and government more injurious in their tendency than the abfence of organifation itfelf. They alfo prove that there are other forms of government which deferve in ordinary cafes to be preferred to anarchy. Now it is incontrovertibly clear that, where one of two evils is inevitable, the wife and juft man will choofe the leaft. Of confequence the wife and juft man, being unable as yet to introduce the form of fociety which his underftanding approves, will contribute to the fupport of fo much coercion, as is neceffary to exclude what is worfe, anarchy.

Suppofed purpofes of coercion in a temporary view : If then conftraint as the antagonist of conftraint must in certain cases and under temporary circumftances be admitted, it is an interesting enquiry to ascertain which of the three ends of coercion-already enumerated must be proposed by the individuals by whom coercion is employed. And here it will be fufficient very briefly to recollect the reasonings that have been stated under each of these heads.

reformation : It cannot be reformation. To reform a man is to change the fentiments fentiments of his mind. Sentiments may be changed either for BOOK VIL. the better or the worfe. They can only be changed by the operation of falfhood or the operation of truth. Punifhment we have already found, at leaft fo far as relates to the individual, is injuffice. The infliction of ftripes upon my body can throw no new light upon the quefiion between us. I can perceive in them nothing but your paffion, your ignorance and your mif-If you have any new light to offer, any cogent arguments take. to introduce; they will not fail, if adequately prefented, to produce their effect. If you be partially informed, ftripes will not fupply the deficiency of your arguments. Whatever be the extent or narrowness of your wildom, it is the only instrument by which you can hope to add to mine. You cannot give that which you do not poffefs. When all is done, I have nothing but the truths you told me by which to derive light to my underftanding. The violence with which the communication of them was accompanied, may prepoffers me against giving them an impartial hearing, but cannot, and certainly ought not, to make their evidence appear greater than your flatement was able to make it.-Thefe arguments are conclusive against coercion as an inftrument of private or individual education.

740

AS A TEMPORARY EXPEDIENT.

But confidering the fubject in a political view it may be faid, " that, however ftrong may be the ideas I am able to communicate to a man in order to his reformation, he may be reftlefs and impatient of expollulation, and of confequence it may be neceffary ceffary to retain him by force, till I can properly have inftilled thefe ideas into his mind." It must be remembered that the idea here is not that of precaution to prevent the mifchiefs he might perpetrate in the mean time, for that belongs to another of the three ends of coercion, that of reftraint. But, feparately from this idea, the argument is peculiarly weak. If the truths I have to communicate be of an energetic and impreffive nature, if they ftand forward perfpicuous and diftinct in my own mind, it will be ftrange if they do not at the outfet excite curiofity and attention in him to whom they are addreffed. It is my duty to choofe a proper feafon at which to communicate them, and not to betray the caufe of truth by an ill timed impatience. This prudence I fhould infallibly exercife, if my object were to obtain fomething interefting to myfelf; why fhould I be lefs quick fighted when I plead the caufe of juffice and eternal reafon? It is a miferable way of preparing a man for conviction, to compel him by violence to hear an expoftulation which he is eager to avoid. These arguments prove, not that we should lose fight of reformation, if coercion for any other reafon appear to be neceffary; but that reformation cannot reafonably be made the object of coercion.

CHAP. V.

BOOK VII. CHAP.V.

742

example :

Coercion for the fake of example is a theory that can never be juftly maintained. The coercion proposed to be employed, confidered absolutely, is either right or wrong. If it be right, it should be employed for its own intrinsic recommendations. If it be wrong, what fort of example does it difplay? To do a thing BOOK VII. for the fake of example, is in other words to do a thing to day. in order to prove that I will do a fimilar thing to-morrow. This muft always be a fubordinate confideration. No argument has been to grofsly abufed as this of example. We found it under the fubject of war * employed to prove the propriety of my doing a thing otherwife wrong, in order to convince the oppofite party that I fhould, when occafion offered, do fomething elfe that was right. He will difplay the beft example, who carefully fludies the principles of juffice, and affiduoufly practifes them. A better effect will be produced in human fociety by my confcientious adherence to them, than by my anxiety to create a fpecific expectation refpecting my future conduct. This argument will be still farther inforced, if we recollect what has already been faid refpecting the inexhauftible differences of different cafes, and the impoffibility of reducing them to general rules.

be

'AS A TEMPORARY EXPEDIENT.

The third object of coercion according to the enumeration retraintalready made is reftraint. If coercion be in any cafe to be admitted, this is the only object it can reafonably propose to itself. The ferious objections to which even in this point of view it is liable have been stated in another stage of the enquiry  $\dagger$ : the a mount of the necessity tending to superfede these objections has also been confidered.

The

OF COERCION CONSIDERED, &c.

The fubject of this chapter is of greater importance, in proportion to the length of time that may poffibly elapfe, before any confiderable part of mankind shall be perfuaded to exchange the prefent complexity of political inftitution for a mode which shall fuperfede the neceffity of coercion. It is highly unworthy of the caufe of truth to fuppofe, that during this interval I have no active duties to perform, that I am not obliged to co-operate for the prefent welfare of the community, as well as for its future regeneration. The temporary obligation that arifes out of this circumftance exactly corresponds with what was formerly delivered on the fubject of duty. Duty is the beft poffible application of a given power to the promotion of the general good *. But my power depends upon the difpofition of the men by whom I am furrounded. If I were inlifted in an army of cowards, it might be my duty to retreat, though abfolutely confidered it fhould have been the duty of the army to come to blows. Under every poffible circumftance it is my duty to advance the general good by the beft means which the circumftances under which I am placed will admit.

* Book IV, Chap. VI, p. 308, 9.

744

BOOK VII. CHAP. V.

CHAP.

[ 745 ]

CHAP. VI.

SCALE OF COERCION.

WITH TORTURE. --- DEATH ABSOLUTELY. --- ORIGIN OF THIS POLICY-IN THE CORRUPTNESS OF POLITICAL IN-STITUTIONS-IN THE INHUMANITY OF THE INSTI-TUTORS .- CORPORAL PUNISHMENT .- ITS ABSURDITY --ITS ATROCIOUSNESS .- PRIVATION OF FREEDOM.-DUTY OF REFORMING OUR NEIGHBOUR AN INFERIOR CON-MODES OF RESTRAINT. --- INDISCRIMINATE IMPRISON-MENT.-SOLITARY IMPRISONMENT.-ITS SEVERITY.-ITS MORAL EFFECTS .- SLAVERY .- BANISHMENT .- I. SIMPLE BANISHMENT. - 2. TRANSPORTATION. - 3. COLONISA-TION .-- THIS PROJECT HAS MISCARRIED FROM UNKIND-NESS-FROM OFFICIOUSNESS.-ITS PERMANENT EVILS.-RECAPITULATION.

T is time to proceed to the confideration of certain in-BOOK VII. ferences that may be deduced from the theory of coercion which has now been delivered; nor can any thing be of greater importance

BOOK VII. importance than these inferences will be found to the virtue, the CHAP. VI. happiness and improvement of mankind.

Its fphere de-And, first, it evidently follows that coercion is an act of painful foribed. neceffity, inconfistent with the true character and genius of mind, the practice of which is temporarily imposed upon us by the corruption and ignorance that reign among mankind. Nothing can be more abfurd than to look to it as a fource of improvement. It contributes to the generation of excellence, just as much as the keeper of the courfe contributes to the fleetnefs of the race. Nothing can be more unjust than to have recourse to it, but upon the most undeniable emergency. Instead of multiplying occasions of coercion, and applying it as the remedy of every moral evil, the true politician will anxioufly confine it within the narroweft limits, and perpetually feek to diminish the occasions of its employ-There is but one reafon by which it can in any cafe be ment. apologifed, and that is, where the fuffering the offender to be at large fhall be notorioufly injurious to the public fecurity.

Its feveral claffes. Secondly, the confideration of reftraint as the only juffifiable ground of coercion, will furnifh us with a fimple and fatisfactory criterion by which to measure the juffice of the fuffering inflicted.

Death with torture. The infliction of a lingering and tormenting death cannot be vindicated upon this hypothefis; for fuch infliction can only be dictated.

dictated by fentiments of refentment on the one hand, or by the BOOK VII. defire to exhibit a terrible example on the other.

To deprive an offender of his life in any manner will appear Death abfoto be unjust, fince it will always be fufficiently practicable without this to prevent him from farther offence. Privation of life. though by no means the greateft injury that can be inflicted, muft always be confidered as a very ferious injury; fince it puts a perpetual close upon the profpects of the fufferer, as to all the enjoyments, the virtues and the excellence of a human being.

In the ftory of those whom the merciles laws of Europe devote to deftruction, we fometimes meet with perfons who fubfequently to their offence have fucceeded to a plentiful inheritance, or who for fome other reafon feem to have had the faireft profpects of tranquillity and happiness opened upon them. Their ftory with a little accommodation may be confidered as the ftory of every If there be any man whom it may be neceffary for offender. the fafety of the whole to put under reftraint, this circumftance is a powerful plea to the humanity and justice of the leading members of the community in his behalf. This is the man who moft ftands in need of their affiftance. If they treated him with kindnefs inftead of fupercilious and unfeeling neglect, if they made him understand with how much reluctance they had been induced to employ the force of the fociety against him, if they prefented truth to his mind with calmnefs, perfpicuity and benevolence, if they they employed those precautions which an humane disposition would not fail to fuggeft, to keep from him the motives of corruption and obstinacy, his reformation would be almost infallible. Thefe are the profpects to which his wants and his miffortunes powerfully entitle him; and it is from these prospects that the hand of the executioner cuts him off for ever.

5 C 2

748 BOOK VII. CHAP. VI.

It is a miftake to fuppofe that this treatment of criminals tends to multiply crimes. On the contrary few men would enter upon a courfe of violence with the certainty of being obliged by a flow. and patient process to amputate their errors. It is the uncertainty of punifhment under the exifting forms that multiplies crimes. Remove this uncertainty, and it would be as reafonable to expect that a man would wilfully break his leg, for the fake of being cured by a fkilful furgeon. Whatever gentlenefs the intellectual phyfician may difplay, it is not to be believed that men can part with rooted habits of injuffice and vice without the fenfation of confiderable pain.

Origin of this policy :

in the corruptnefs of political infitutions:

The true reafons in confequence of which these forlorn and deferted members of the community are brought to an ignominious death, are, first, the peculiar iniquity of the civil institutions of that community, and, fecondly, the fupineness and apathy of their fuperiors. In republican and fimple forms of government punishments are rare, the punishment of death is almost unknown. On the other hand the more there is in any country of inequality inequality and oppreffion, the more punishments are multiplied. BOOK VII. The more the inflitutions of fociety contradict the genuine fentiments of the human mind, the more feverely is it neceffary to avenge their violation. At the fame time the rich and titled in the inmembers of the community, proud of their fancied eminence, the inftitupehold with total unconcern the deftruction of the deftitute and the wretched, difdaining to recollect that, if there be any intrinfic difference between them, it is the offspring of their different circumftances, and that the man whom they now fo much defpife, would have been as accomplifhed and fufceptible as they, if they had only changed fituations. When we behold a ftring of poor wretches brought out for execution, juffice will prefent to our affrighted fancy all the hopes and poffibilities which are thus brutally extinguished, the genius, the daring invention, the unfhrinking firmnefs, the tender charities and ardent benevolence, which have occafionally under this fyftem been facrificed at the fhrine of torpid luxury and unrelenting avarice.

The fpecies of fuffering commonly known by the appellation Corporal puof corporal punifhment is also proferibed by the fyftem above established. Corporal punishment, unless so far as it is intended for example, appears in one refpect in a very ludicrous point of view. It is an expeditious mode of proceeding, which has been invented in order to compress the effect of much reasoning and long confinement, that might otherwife have been neceffary; into a very fhort compass. In another view it is not possible to exprefs humanity of tore nifhment.

Its abfurdity.

BOOK VII. CHAP. VI. Its atrociouf-

750 express the abhorrence it ought to create. The genuine propenfity of man is to venerate mind in his fellow man. With what delight do we contemplate the progrefs of intellect, its efforts for the difcovery of truth, the harveft of virtue that fprings up under the genial influence of inftruction, the wifdom that is generated through the medium of unreftricted communication ? How completely do violence and corporal infliction reverse the scene? From this moment all the wholsome avenues of mind are clofed, and on every fide we fee them guarded with a train of difgraceful paffions, hatred, revenge, defpotifm, cruelty, hypocrify, confpiracy and cowardice. Man becomes the enemy of man; the ftronger are feized with the luft of unbridled domination, and the weaker fhrink with hopelefs difguft from the approach of a fellow. With what feelings must an enlightened observer contemplate the furrow of a lash imprinted upon the body of a man? What heart beats not in unifon with the fublime law of antiquity, "Thou shalt not inflict stripes upon the body of a Roman ?" There is but one alternative in this cafe on the part of the fufferer. Either his mind muft be fubdued by the arbitrary dictates of the fuperior (for to him all is arbitrary that does not ftand approved to the judgment of his own underftanding); he will be governed by fomething that is not reafon, and ashamed of fomething that is not difgrace; or elfe every pang he endures will excite the honeft indignation of his heart and fix the clear difapprobation of his intellect, will produce contempt and alienation, against his punisher.

9

The

The juffice of coercion is built upon this fimple principle: Every man is bound to employ fuch means as fhall fuggeft themfelves for preventing evils fubverfive of general fecurity, it being firft afcertained, either by experience or reafoning, that all milder methods are inadequate to the exigence of the cafe. The conclution from this principle is, that we are bound under certain urgent circumftances to deprive the offender of the liberty he has abufed. Farther than this no circumftance can authorife us. He whofe perfon is imprifoned (if that be the right kind of feclufion) cannot interrupt the peace of his fellows; and the infliction of farther evil, when his power to injure is removed, is the wild and unauthorifed dictate of vengeance and rage, the wanton fport of unqueflioned fuperiority.

When indeed the perfon of the offender has been first feized, there is a farther duty incumbent on his punisher, the duty of reforming him. But this makes no part of the direct confideration. The duty of every man to contribute to the intellectual health of his neighbour is of general application. Befide which it is proper to recollect what has been already demonstrated, that coercion of no fort is among the legitimate means of reformation. Reftrain the offender as long as the fafety of the community prefcribes it, for this is just. Reftrain him not an instant from a fimple view to his own improvement, for this is contrary to reason and morality. BOOK VII. CHAP. VI. Privation of freedom.

Duty of reforming our neighbour an inferior confideration in this cafe.

Meanwhile

BOOK VII. CHAP. VI. Its place deferibed. Meanwhile there is one circumftance by means of which reftraint and reformation are clofely connected. The perfon of the offender is to be reftrained as long as the public fafety would be endangered by his liberation. But the public fafety will ceafe to be endangered, as foon as his propenfities and difpolitions have undergone a change. The connection which thus refults from the nature of things, renders it neceffary that, in deciding upon the fpecies of reftraint to be impofed, thefe two circumftances be confidered jointly, how the perfonal liberty of the offender may be leaft intrenched upon, and how his reformation may be beft promoted.

Modes of re-

Indiferiminate impriforment. The moft common method purfued in depriving the offender of the liberty he has abufed is to erect a public jail in which offenders of every defcription are thruft together, and left to form among themfelves what fpecies of fociety they can. Various circumftances contribute to imbue them with habits of indolence and vice, and to difcourage induftry; and no effort is made to remove or foften these circumftances. It cannot be neceffary to expatiate upon the atrocious for this fystem. Jails are to a proverb feminaries of vice; and he must be an uncommon proficient in the passion and the practice of injuffice, or a man of fublime virtue, who does not come out of them a much worfe man than he entered.

An active observer of mankind*, with the pureft intentions, DOOK VII. and who had paid a very particular attention to this fubject, was ftruck with the mifchievous tendency of the reigning fyftem, prifonment, and called the attention of the public to a fcheme of folitary imprisonment. But this, though free from the defects of the eftablished mode, is liable to very weighty objections.

Solitary im-

753

It must strike every reflecting mind as uncommonly tyrannical Its feverity. and fevere. It cannot therefore be admitted into the fyftem of mild coercion which forms the topic of our enquiry. Man is a focial animal. How far he is neceffarily fo will appear, if we confider the fum of advantages refulting from the focial, and of which he would be deprived in the folitary flate. But, independently of his original ftructure, he is eminently focial by his habits. Will you deprive the man you imprifon, of paper and books, of tools and amufements? One of the arguments in favour of folitary imprifonment is, that it is neceffary the offender fhould be called off from his wrong habits of thinking, and obliged to enter into himfelf. This the advocates of folitary imprifonment probably believe will be most effectually done. the fewer be the avocations of the prifoner. But let us fuppofe that he is indulged in these particulars, and only deprived of fociety. How many men are there that can derive amufement from books ? We are in this refpect the creatures of habit, and it is fearcely to be expected from ordinary men that they fhould mould themfelves

* Mr. Howard.

CHAP. VI.

BOOK VII. to any fpecies of employment, to which in their youth they were wholly ftrangers. But he that is most fond of ftudy has his moments when fludy pleafes no longer. The foul yearns with inexpreffible longings for the fociety of its like. Becaufe the public fafety unwillingly commands the confinement of an offender, muft he for that reafon never light up his countenance with a fmile ? Who can tell the fufferings of him who is condemned to uninterrupted folitude? Who can tell that this is not, to the majority of mankind, the bittereft torment that human ingenuity can inflict? No doubt a mind truly fublime would conquer this inconvenience : but the powers of fuch a mind do not enter into the prefent queftion.

Its moral effects.

From the examination of folitary imprifonment in itfelf confidered, we are naturally led to enquire into its real tendency as to the article of reformation. To be virtuous it is requifite that we should confider men and their relation to each other. As a preliminary to this ftudy is it neceffary that we fhould be fhut out from the fociety of men? Shall we be most effectually formed to justice, benevolence and prudence in our intercourfe with each other, in a state of folitude ? Will not our felfish and unfocial difpofitions be perpetually increafed ? What temptation has he to think of benevolence or justice who has no opportunity to exercife it ? The true foil in which atrocious crimes are found to germinate, is a gloomy and morofe difpofition. Will his heart become much either foftened or expanded, who breathes the atmosphere of a dungeon? Surely it would be better in this refpect refpect to imitate the fyftem of the univerfe, and, if we would BOOK VII. teach juffice and humanity, tranfplant thofe we would teach into a natural and reafonable ftate of fociety. Solitude abfolutely confidered may infligate us to ferve ourfelves, but not to ferve our neighbours. Solitude, imposed under too few limitations, may be a nurfery for madmen and idiots, but not for useful members of fociety.

Another idea which has fuggefted itfelf with regard to the Slavery. relegation of offenders from the community they have injured. is that of reducing them to a flate of flavery or hard labour. The true refutation of this fystem is anticipated in what has been already faid. To the fafety of the community it is unneceffary. As a means to the reformation of the offender it is inexpreffibly ill conceived. Man is an intellectual being. There is no way to make him virtuous, but in calling out his intellectual powers. There is no way to make him virtuous, but by making him independent. He must study the laws of nature and the necesfary confequence of actions, not the arbitrary caprice of his fuperior. Do you defire that I fhould work? Do not drive me to it with the whip; for, if before I thought it better to be idle, this will but increase my alienation. Perfuade my understanding, and render it the fubject of my choice. It can only be by the most deplorable perversion of reason, that we can be induced to believe any fpecies of flavery, from the flavery

5 D 2

of BOOK VII. of the fchool boy to that of the most unfortunate negro in our CHAP. VI. West India plantations, favourable to virtue.

- Banishment. A fcheme greatly preferable to any of these, and which has been tried under various forms, is that of transportation, or banishment. This fcheme under the most judicious modifications is liable to objection. It would be strange if any scheme of coercion or violence were not to. But it has been made appear still more exceptionable than it will be found in its intrinsic nature, by the crude and incoherent circumstances with which it has usually been executed.
- r. Simple banishment. Banishment in its fimple form is evidently unjust. The citizen whose refidence we deem injurious in our own country, we have no right to impose upon another.
- <sup>2</sup>. Tranfportation. Banifhment has fometimes been joined with flavery. Such was the practice of Great Britain previoufly to the defection of her American colonies. This cannot fland in need of a feparate refutation.
- 3. Colonization. The true fpecies of banifhment is removal to a country yet unfettled. The labour by which the untutored mind is beft weaned from the vicious habits of a corrupt fociety, is the labour, not which is prefcribed by the mandate of a fuperior, but which is imposed by the neceffity of fubfistence. The first fettlement of of Rome by Romulus and his vagabonds is a happy image of BOOK VIL. this, whether we confider it as a real hiftory, or as the ingenious fiction of a man well acquainted with the principles of mind. Men who are freed from the injurious inftitutions of European government, and obliged to begin the world for themfelves, are in the direct road to be virtuous.

Two circumftances have hitherto rendered abortive this rea- This project fonable project. First, that the mother country purfues this ried : fpecies of colony with her hatred. Our chief anxiety is in reality nefs: to render its refidence odious and uncomfortable, with the vain idea of deterring offenders. Our chief anxiety ought to be to fmooth their difficulties, and contribute to their happinefs. We fhould recollect that the colonifts are men for whom we ought to feel no fentiments but those of love and compaffion. If we were reafonable, we fhould regret the cruel exigence that obliges us to treat them in a manner unfuitable to the nature of mind : and having complied with the demand of that exigence, we fhould next be anxious to confer upon them every benefit in our power. But we are unreafonable. We harbour a thoufand favage feelings of refentment and vengeance. We thruft them out to the remoteft corner of the world. We fubject them to perifh by multitudes with hardfhip and hunger. Perhaps to the refult of mature reflection banishment to the Hebrides, would appear as effectual as banifhment to the Antipodes.

has mifcarfrom unkind-

5

Secondly,

CHAP. VI.

BOOK VII. CHAP. VI. from officioufnefs. Secondly, it is abfolutely neceffary upon the principles here explained that these colonists, after having been fufficiently provided in the outset, should be left to themselves. We do worse than nothing, if we pursue them into their obscure retreat with the inauspicious influence of our European institutions. It is a mark of the profoundest ignorance of the nature of man, to suppose that, if left to themselves, they would universally destroy each other. On the contrary, new situations make new minds. The worst criminals when turned adrift in a body, and reduced to feel the churliss fang of necessity, conduct themselves upon reasonable principles, and often proceed with a fagacity and public so the bluss.

Its permanent evils. Meanwhile let us not forget the inherent vices of coercion, which prefent themfelves from whatever point the fubject is viewed. Colonization feems to be the moft eligible of those expedients which have been ftated, but it is attended with confiderable difficulties. The community judges of a certain individual that his refidence cannot be tolerated among them confiftently with the general fafety. In denying him his choice among other communities do they not exceed their commiffion? What treatment fhall be awarded him, if he return from the banishment to which he was fentenced ?—These difficulties are calculated to bring back the mind to the absolute injustice of coercion, and to render us inexpressibly anxious for the advent of that policy by which it shall be abolished.

6

To

To conclude. The observations of this chapter are relative to BOOK VIT. a theory, which affirmed that it might be the duty of individuals, but never of communities, to exert a certain fpecies of political tion. coercion; and which founded this duty upon a confideration of the benefits of public fecurity. Under these circumstances then every individual is bound to judge for himfelf, and to yield his countenance to no other coercion than that which is indifpenfibly neceffary. He will no doubt endeavour to meliorate those inftitutions with which he cannot perfuade his countrymen to part. He will decline all concern in the execution of fuch, as abufe the plea of public fecurity to the most atrocious purposes. Laws may eafily be found in almost every code, which, on account of the iniquity of their provisions, are fuffered to fall into difufe by general confent. Every lover of juffice will uniformly in this way contribute to the repeal of all laws, that wantonly usurp upon the independence of mankind, either by the multiplicity of their reftrictions, or feverity of their fanctions.

CHAP. VI. Recapitula-

[ 760 ]

CHAP. VII.

OF EVIDENCE.

DIFFICULTIES TO WHICH THIS SUBJECT IS LIABLE-EX-EMPLIFIED IN THE DISTINCTION BETWEEN OVERT INTENTIONS. ---- REASONS ACTIONS AND AGAINST THIS DISTINCTION. - PRINCIPLE IN WHICH IT IS FOUNDED.

BOOK VII. CHAP. VII. HAVING fufficiently afcertained the decifion in which queftions of offence againft the general fafety ought to terminate, it only remains under this head of enquiry to confider the principles according to which the trial fhould be conducted. These principles may for the most part be referred to two points, the evidence that is to be required, and the method to be purfued by us in claffing offences.

Difficulties to which this fubject is liable: The difficulties to which the fubject of evidence is liable, have been repeatedly flated in the earlier divisions of this work*. It may be worth while in this place to recollect the difficulties which attend upon one particular class of evidence, it being fcarcely * Book II, Chap. VI. Book VII, Chap. IV.

poffible

OF EVIDENCE.

poffible that the imagination of every reader fhould not fuffice BOOK VII. him to apply this text, and to perceive how eafily the fame kind of enumeration might be extended to any other class.

It has been afked, "Why intentions are not fubjected to the exemplified animadversion of criminal justice, in the fame manner as direct tinction beacts of offence ?"

The arguments in favour of their being thus fubjected are obvious. "The proper object of political fuperintendence is not the paft, but the future. Society cannot justly employ coercion against any individual, however atrocious may have been his mildemeanours, from any other than a prospective confideration. that is, a confideration of the danger with which his habits may be pregnant to the general fafety. Paft conduct cannot properly fall under the animadverfion of government, except fo far as it is an indication of the future. But paft conduct appears at first fight to afford a flighter prefumption as to what the delinquent will do hereafter, than declared intention. The man who profeffes his determination to commit murder, feems to be fcarcely a lefs dangerous member of fociety, than he who, having already committed murder, has no apparent intention to repeat his offence." And yet all governments have agreed either to pass over the menace in filence, or to fubject the offender to a much lefs degree of coercion, than they employ against him, by whom 5 E the in the diftween overt acts and intentions.

CHAP.VII.

Reafons againft this diffinction.

OF EVIDENCE.

BOOK VII. the crime has been perpetrated. It may be right perhaps, to yield them fome attention when they thus agree in forbearance, though little undoubtedly is due to their agreement in inhumanity.

> This diffinction, fo far as it is founded in reafon, has relation principally to the uncertainty of evidence. Before the intention of any man can be afcertained in a court of juffice from the confideration of the words he has employed, a variety of circumstances must be taken into the account. The witness heard the words which were employed: does he repeat them accurately, or has not his want of memory caufed him to fubflitute in the room of some of them words of his own? Before it is poffible to decide upon the confident expectation I may entertain that these words will be followed with correspondent actions, it is neceffary I should know the exact tone with which they were delivered, and gesture with which they were accompanied. It is neceffary I should be acquainted with the context, and the occafion that produced them. Their conftruction will depend upon the quantity of momentary heat or rooted malice with which they were delivered; and words, which appear at first fight of tremendous import, will fometimes be found upon accurate investigation to have had a meaning purely ironical in the mind of the fpeaker. Thefe confiderations, together with the odious nature of coercion in general,

Principle in which it is founded.

OFEVIDENCE. 763

general, and the extreme mifchief that may attend our reftraining the faculty of fpeech in addition to the reftraint we conceive ourfelves obliged to put on men's actions, will probably be found to afford a fufficient reafon, why words ought feldom or never to be made a topic of political animadverfion,

[ 764 ]

CHAP. VIII.

OF LAW.

LAW IS, I. ENDLESS-PARTICULARLY IN A FREE STATE. -CAUSES OF THIS DISADVANTAGE .--- 2. UNCERTAIN ---INSTANCED IN QUESTIONS OF PROPERTY .-- MODE IN . WHICH IT MUST BE STUDIED .---- 3. PRETENDS TO FORE-TEL FUTURE EVENTS. --- LAWS ARE A SPECIES OF PRO-MISES --- CHECK THE FREEDOM OF OPINION --- ARE DE-STRUCTIVE OF THE PRINCIPLES OF REASON. --- DISHO-NESTY OF LAWYERS. ---- AN HONEST LAWYER MIS-CHIEVOUS .- ABOLITION OF LAW VINDICATED ON THE SCORE OF WISDOM - OF CANDOUR - FROM THE NA-TURE OF MAN .- FUTURE HISTORY OF POLITICAL JUS-TICE.---ERRORS THAT MIGHT ARISE IN THE COMMENCE-MENT. --- ITS GRADUAL PROGRESS. --- ITS EFFECTS ON CRIMINAL LAW - ON PROPERTY.

EDOCK VII. CHAP.VIII. A FARTHER article of great importance in the trial of offences, is that of the method to be purfued by us in claffing them, and the confequent apportioning the degree of animadversion to the cases that may arise. This article brings us to the direct confideration of law, which is without doubt one BOOK VII. of the moft important topics upon which human intellect can be employed. It is law which has hitherto been regarded in countries calling themfelves civilifed, as the ftandard, by which to measure all offences and irregularities that fall under public animadversion. Let us fairly investigate the merits of this choice.

The comparison which has prefented itself to those by whom the topic has been investigated, has hitherto been between law on one fide, and the arbitrary will of a despot on the other. But, if we would fairly estimate the merits of law, we should first confider it as it is in itself, and then, if necessary, fearch for the most eligible principle that may be substituted in its place.

It has been recommended as "affording information to the Arguments different members of the community refpecting the principles is recomwhich will be adopted in deciding upon their actions." It has been reprefented as the higheft degree of iniquity, "to try men by an ex post facto law, or indeed in any other manner than by the letter of a law, formally made, and fufficiently promulgated."

How far it will be fafe altogether to annihilate this principle Anfwer, we fhall prefently have occasion to enquire. It is obvious at first fight to remark, that it is of most importance in a country where the fystem of jurisprudence is most capricious and absurd.

If

ÒFLAW.

BOOK VII. CHAP. VIII.

766

If it be deemed criminal in any fociety to wear clothes of a particular texture, or buttons of a particular composition, it is natural to exclaim, that it is high time the jurifprudence of that fociety fhould inform its members what are the fantaftic rules by which they mean to proceed. But, if a fociety be contented with the rules of juffice, and do not affume to itfelf the right of difforting or adding to those rules, there law is evidently a lefs neceffary inftitution. The rules of juffice would be more clearly and effectually taught by an actual intercourfe with human fociety unreftrained by the fetters of preposite films, than they can be by catechifms and codes *.

Law is, 1. endlefs :

particularly in free ftates. One refult of the inftitution of law is, that the inftitution once begun, can never be brought to a clofe. Edict is heaped upon edict, and volume upon volume. This will be moft the cafe, where the government is moft popular, and its proceedings have moft in them of the nature of deliberation. Surely this is no flight indication that the principle is wrong, and that of confequence, the farther we proceed in the path it marks out to us, the more fhall we be bewildered. No tafk can be more hopelefs than that of effecting a coalition between a right principle and a wrong. He that ferioufly and fincerely attempts it, will perhaps expose himfelf to more palpable ridicule, than he who, inftead of profeffing two oppofite fyftems, fhould adhere to the worft.

Caufes of this difadvantage.

Lot Adda to .

There is no maxim more clear than this, Every cafe is a rule * Book VI, Chap. VIII, p. 671.

tə

to itfelf. No action of any man was ever the fame as any other BOOK VII. action, had ever the fame degree of utility or injury. It fhould feem to be the business of justice, to diffinguish the qualities of men, and not, which has hitherto been the practice, to confound them. But what has been the refult of an attempt to do this in relation to law? As new cafes occur, the law is perpetually found deficient. How fhould it be otherwife? Lawgivers have not the faculty of unlimited prefcience, and cannot define that which is infinite. The alternative that remains, is either to wreft the law to include a cafe which was never in the contemplation of the author, or to make a new law to provide for this particular cafe. Much has been done in the first of these modes. The quibbles of lawyers and the arts by which they refine and diftort the fenfe of the law, are proverbial. But, though much is done, every thing cannot be thus done. The abufe would fometimes be too palpable. Not to fay, that the very education that enables the lawyer, when he is employed for the profecutor, to find out offences the lawgiver never meant, enables him, when he is employed for the defendant, to find out fubterfuges that reduce the law to a nullity. It is therefore perpetually neceffary to make new laws. Thefe laws, in order to efcape, evalion, are frequently tedious, minute and circumlocutory The volume in which juffice records her prefcriptions is for ever increasing, and the world would not contain the books that might be written.

The

ń,

BOOK VII. CHAP.VIII. 2. uncertain :

inftanced in queftions of property.

The confequence of the infinitude of law is its uncertainty. This ftrikes directly at the principle upon which law is founded. Laws were made to put an end to ambiguity, and that each man might know what he had to depend upon. How well have they answered this purpose? Let us instance in the article of property. Two men go to law for a certain eftate. They would not go to law, if they had not both of them an opinion of their fuccefs. But we may fuppofe them partial in their own cafe. They would not continue to go to law, if they were not both promifed fuccefs by their lawyers. Law was made that a plain man might know what he had to depend upon, and yet the most skilful practitioners differ about the event of my fuit. It will fometimes happen that the most celebrated pleader in the kingdom, or the first counfel in the fervice of the crown. shall affure me of infallible fuccess, five minutes before another law officer, styled the keeper of the king's confcience, by fome unexpected juggle decides it against me. Would the iffue have been equally uncertain, if I had had nothing to truft to but the plain, unperverted fense of a jury of my neighbours, founded in the ideas they entertained of general justice? Lawyers have abfurdly maintained, that the expensiveness of law is necessary to prevent the unbounded multiplication of fuits; but the true fource of this multiplication is uncertainty. Men do not quarrel about that which is evident, but that which is obfcure.

Mode in which it must be fludied. It would fludy the laws of a country accuftomed to legal legal fecurity, must begin with the volumes of the statutes. He BOOK VII. must add a strict enquiry into the common or unwritten law; and he ought to digrefs into the civil, the ecclefiaftical and canon law. To understand the intention of the authors of a law, he must be acquainted with their characters and views, and with the various circumftances, to which it owed its rife, and by which it was modified while under deliberation. To understand the weight and interpretation that will be allowed to it in a court of justice, he must have studied the whole collection of records, decifions and precedents. Law was originally devifed that ordinary men might know what they had to depend upon, and there is not at this day a lawyer exifting in Great Britain, prefumptuous and vain-glorious enough to pretend that he has maftered the code. Nor must it be forgotten that time and industry, even were they infinite, would not fuffice. It is a labyrinth without end; it is a mass of contradictions that cannot be extricated. Study will enable the lawyer to find in it plaufible, perhaps unanfwerable, arguments for any fide of almost any queftion; but it would argue the utmost folly to suppose that the fludy of law can lead to knowledge and certainty.

A farther confideration that will demonstrate the abfurdity of 3. pretends to law in its most general acceptation is, that it is of the nature of events. prophecy. Its tafk is to defcribe what will be the actions of mankind, and to dictate decifions refpecting them. Its merits Laws are a in this refpect have already been decided under the head of promifes:

fpecies of promifes.

5 F

CHAP. VIII.

check the freedom of ovinion:

BOOK VII. promifes *. The language of fuch a procedure is, "We are for wife, that we can draw no additional knowledge from circumftances as they occur; and we pledge ourfelves that, if it be otherwife, the additional knowledge we acquire shall produce no effect upon our conduct." It is proper to obferve, that this fubject of law may be confidered in fome refpects as more properly. belonging to the topic of the preceding book. Law tends no. lefs than creeds, catechifms and tefts, to fix the human mind in a ftagnant condition, and to fubftitute a principle of permanence, in the room of that unceasing perfectibility which is the only falubrious element of mind. All the arguments therefore which were employed upon that occasion may be applied to the fubject now under confideration.

are deftructive of the principles of reafon.

The fable of Procrustes prefents us with a faint shadow of the perpetual effort of law. In defiance of the great principle of natural philosophy, that there are not fo much as two atoms of matter of the fame form through the whole universe, it endeayours to reduce the actions of men, which are composed of a thousand evanescent elements, to one standard. We have already feen the tendency of this endeavour in the article of murder +. It was in the contemplation of this fystem of jurifprudence, that the ftrange maxim was invented, that "ftrict * Book III, Chap. III.

+ Book II, Chap. VI, p. 131. Book VII, Chap. IV, p. 718.

justice

juftice would often prove the higheft injuftice *." There is no BOOK VII. more real juftice in endeavouring to reduce the actions of men into claffes, than there was in the fcheme to which we have juft alluded, of reducing all men to the fame ftature. If on the contrary juftice be a refult flowing from the contemplation of all the circumftances of each individual cafe, if the only criterion of juftice be general utility, the inevitable confequence is that, the more we have of juftice, the more we fhall have of truth, virtue and happinefs.

From all these confiderations we cannot hefitate to conclude univerfally that law is an inflitution of the most pernicious tendency.

The fubject will receive fome additional elucidation, if we Differently of confider the pernicioufnefs of law in its immediate relation to those who practife it. If there ought to be no fuch thing as law, the profession of a lawyer is no doubt entitled to our difapprobation. A lawyer can fearcely fail to be a different man. This is lefs a fubject for censure than for regret. Men are the creatures of the necessfities under which they are placed. He that is habitually goaded by the incentives of vice, will not fail to be vicious. He that is perpetually conversant in quibbles, false colours and fophiftry, cannot equally cultivate the generous * Summum jus fumma injuria.

5 F 2

emotions

CHAP. VIII.

BOOK VII. emotions of the foul and the nice difcernment of rectitude. If a fingle individual can be found who is but fuperficially tainted with the contagion, how many men on the other hand, in whom we faw the promife of the fublimest virtues, have by this trade been rendered indifferent to confiftency or acceffible to a bribe ? Be it obferved, that thefe remarks apply principally to men eminent or fuccefsful in their profession. He that enters into an employment carelefsly and by way of amufement, is much lefs under its influence (though he will not escape), than he that enters into it with ardour and devotion.

An honeft lawyer mif-chievous.

Let us however fuppofe, a circumftance which is perhaps altogether impoffible, that a man shall be a perfectly honest lawyer. He is determined to plead no caufe that he does not believe to be just, and to employ no argument that he does not apprehend to be folid. He defigns, as far as his fphere extends, to ftrip law of its ambiguities, and to fpeak the manly language of This man is no doubt highly refpectable fo far as reafon. relates to himfelf, but it may be queffioned whether he be not a more pernicious member of fociety than the difhonest lawyer. The hopes of mankind in relation to their future progrefs. depend upon their observing the genuine effects of erroneous institutions. But this man is employed in foftening and mafking these effects. His conduct has a direct tendency to postpone the reign of found policy, and to render mankind tranquil in the midft of imperfection and ignorance. It may appear indeed a para-a paradox to affirm that virtue can be more pernicious than vice. But the true folution of this difficulty lies in the remark, that virtue, fuch as is here deferibed, is impoffible. We may amufe ourfelves with enquiring in fuch inftances as this whether theory could not afford us a better fyftem of intellectual progrefs than the mixed fyftem which takes place in the world. But the true anfwer probably is, that what we call vice is mere error of the underftanding, a neceffary part of the gradation that leads to good, and in a word that the courfe of nature and the courfe of a perfect theory are in all cafes the fame.

The true principle which ought to be fubfituted in the room of law, is that of reafon exercifing an uncontroled jurifdiction upon the circumftances of the cafe. To this principle no obiection can arife on the fcore of wifdom. It is not to be fuppofed that there are not men now exifting, whole intellectual accomplifhments rife to the level of law. Law we fometimes call the wildom of our anceftors. But this is a ftrange imposition. It was as frequently the dictate of their paffion, of timidity, iealoufy, a monopolifing fpirit, and a luft of power that knew no bounds. Are we not obliged perpetually to revife and remodel this mifnamed wildom of our anceftors? to correct it by a detection of their ignorance and a condemnation of their intolerance? But, if men can be found among us whole wildom is equal to the wifdom of law, it will fcarcely be maintained, that the truths they have to communicate will be the worfe for having

BOOK VII. CHAP. VIII.

Abolition of law vindicated on the fcore of wifdom :

BOOK VII. having no authority, but that which they derive from the CHAP. VIII. reafons that fupport them.

of eandour: It may however be alledged that, "if there be little difficulty in fecuring a current portion of wifdom, there may neverthelefs be fomething to be feared from the paffions of men. Law may be fuppofed to have been conftructed in the tranquil ferenity of the foul, a fuitable monitor to check the inflamed mind with which the recent memory of ills might induce us to proceed to the exercise of coercion." This is the most confiderable argument that can be adduced in favour of the prevailing fystem, and therefore deferves a mature examination.

The true answer to this objection is that nothing can be imfrom the nature of man : proved but in conformity to its nature. If we confult for the welfare of man, we must bear perpetually in mind the structure It must be admitted that we are imperfect, ignorant, of man. the flaves of appearances. These defects can be removed by no indirect method, but only by the introduction of knowledge. A fpecimen of the indirect method we have in the doctrine of fpiritual infallibility. It was observed that men were liable to error, to dispute for ever without coming to a decision, to miftake in their moft important interefts. What was wanting, was fuppofed to be a criterion and a judge of controverfies. What was attempted, was to endue truth with a visible form, and then repair to the oracle we had erected.

The cafe refpecting law is exactly parallel to this. Men BOOK VII. were aware of the deceitfulnels of appearances, and they fought a talifman to guard them from imposition. Suppose I were to determine at the commencement of every day upon a certain code of principles to which I would conform the conduct of the day, and at the commencement of every year the conduct of the year. Suppose I were to determine that no circumftances should be allowed by the light they afforded to modify my conduct, left I should become the dupe of appearance and the flave of paffion. This is a just and accurate image of every fystem of permanence. Such fystems are formed upon the idea of stopping the perpetual motion of the machine, left it should fometimes fall into diforder.

This confideration must fufficiently perfuade an impartialmind that, whatever inconveniences may arife from the paffions of men, the introduction of fixed laws cannot be the genuine remedy. Let us confider what would be the operation and progreffive flate of these paffions, provided men were trusted to the guidance of their own differentiation. Such is the difficipline that a reasonable flate of fociety employs with respect to man in his individual capacity *: why should it not be equally valid with respect to men acting in a collective capacity ? Inexperience and zeal would prompt me to restrain my neighbour whenever he is acting wrong, and, by penalties and inconveniences

* Book V, Chap. XX, p. 548.

defignedly

776

BOOK VII. defignedly interpofed, to cure him of his errors. But reafon evinces the folly of this proceeding, and teaches me that, if he be not accuftomed to depend upon the energies of intellect, he will never rife to the dignity of a rational being. As long as a man is held in the trammels of obedience, and habituated to look to fome foreign guidance for the direction of his conduct, his underftanding and the vigour of his mind will fleep. Do I defire to raife him to the energy of which he is capable ? I muft teach him to feel himfelf, to bow to no authority, to examine the principles he entertains, and render to his mind the reafon of his conduct.

> The habits which are thus falutary to the individual will be equally falutary in the transactions of communities. Men are weak at prefent, because they have always been told they are weak, and must not be trusted with themselves. Take them out of their shackles; bid them enquire, reason and judge; and you will soon find them very different beings. Tell them that they have passions, are occasionally hasty, intemperate and injurious, but they must be trusted with themselves. Tell them that the mountains of parchment in which they have been hitherto intrenched, are fit only to impose upon ages of superfition and ignorance; that henceforth we will have no dependence but upon their spontaneous justice; that, if their passions be gigantic, they must rife with gigantic energy to fubdue them; that, if their decrees be iniquitous, the iniquity shall be all their > > own.

own. The effect of this difpolition of things will foon be vifi- BOOK VII. CHAP. VIII. ble; mind will rife to the level of its fituation; juries and umpires will be penetrated with the magnitude of the truft repofed in them.

It may be no uninflructive fpectacle to furvey the progreffive Future hifestablishment of justice in the state of things which is here re- tical justice. commended. At first it may be a few decisions will be made Errors that uncommonly abfurd or atrocious. But the authors of these in the comdecifions will be confounded with the unpopularity and difgrace in which they have involved themfelves. In reality, whatever were the original fource of law, it foon became cherifhed as a cloke for oppreffion. Its obfcurity was of use to millead the inquifitive eye of the fufferer. Its antiquity ferved to divert a confiderable part of the odium from the perpetrator of the injuffice to the author of the law, and fill more to difarm that odium by the influence of fuperfittious awe. It was well known that unvarnished, barefaced oppression could not fail to be the victim of its own operations.

To this flatement it may indeed be objected, " that bodies of men have often been found callous to cenfure, and that the difgrace, being amicably divided among them all, is intolerable to none." In this obfervation there is confiderable force, but it is inapplicable to the prefent argument. To this fpecies of abufe one of two things is indifpenfibly neceffary, either num-tory of polimight arife mencement.

BOOK VII. Chap. VIII.

bers or fecrecy. To this abufe therefore it will be a fufficient remedy, that each jurifdiction be confiderably limited, and all transactions conducted in an open and explicit manner.—To proceed.

Its gradual progrefs.

The juridical decifions that were made immediately after the abolition of law, would differ little from those during its empire. They would be the decifions of prejudice and habit. But habit, having loft the centre about which it revolved, would diminish in the regularity of its operations. Those to whom the arbitration of any queftion was intrufted, would frequently recollect that the whole cafe was committed to their deliberation, and they could not fail occafionally to examine themfelves refpecting the reafon of those principles which had hitherto paffed uncontroverted. Their understandings would grow enlarged, in proportion as they felt the importance of their truft, and the unbounded freedom of their inveftigation. Here then would commence an aufpicious order of things, of which no underftanding of man at prefent in exiftence can foretel the refult, the dethronement of implicit faith and the inauguration of unclouded juffice.

Its effects on criminal law : Some of the conclusions of which this flate of things would be the harbinger, have been already feen in the judgment that would be made of offences against the community *. Offences arguing infinite variety in the depravity from which they fprung, BOOK VII. would no longer be confounded under fome general name. Juries would grow as perfpicacious in diffinguifhing, as they are now indiferiminate in confounding the merit of actions and characters.

* Book II, Chap. VI, p. 131. Book VII, Chap. IV, p. 718.

Let us confider the effects of the abolition of law as it on property. respects the article of property. As foon as the minds of men became fomewhat weared from the unfeeling uniformity of the prefent fyftem, they would begin to enquire after equity. In this fituation let us fuppofe a litigated fucceffion brought before them, to which there were five heirs, and that the fentence of their old legiflation had directed the division of this property into five equal fhares. They would begin to enquire into the wants and fituation of the claimants. The first we will suppose to have a fair character and be profperous in the world : he is a refpectable member of fociety, but farther wealth would add little either to his ufefulnefs or his enjoyment. The fecond is a miferable object, perifhing with want, and overwhelmed with calamity. The third, though poor, is yet tranguil; but there is a fituation to which his virtue leads him to afpire, and in which he may be of uncommon fervice, but which he cannot with propriety accept, without a capital equal to two fifths of the whole fucceffion. One of the claimants is an unmarried woman paft the age of childbearing. Another is a widow, unprovided, and with a numerous family depending on her fuccour.

5 G 2

OF LAW.

BOOK VII. CHAP. VIII. fuccour. The first question that would fuggest itself to unprejudiced performs, having the allotment of this fuccession referred to their unlimited decision, would be, what justice is there in the indiferiminate partition which has hitherto prevailed? This would be one of the early fuggestions that would produce a shock in the prevailing system of property. To enquire into the general issue of these fuggestions is the principal object of the following book.

An obfervation which cannot have escaped the reader in the perusal of this chapter, is, that law is merely relative to the exercise of political force, and must perish when the necessfity for that force ceases, if the influence of truth do not still fooner extirpate it from the practice of mankind.

СНАР.

[ 781 ].

IX. CHAP.

OF PARDONS.

THEIR ABSURDITY .- THEIR ORIGIN. - THEIR ABUSES.---THEIR ARBITRARY CHARACTER .- DESTRUCTIVE OF MO-RALITY.

HERE is one other topic which belongs to the fubject of BOOK VII. CHAP. IX. the prefent book, but which may be difmiffed in a very few words, becaufe, though it has unhappily been in almost all cafes neglected in practice, it is a point that feems to admit of uncommonly funple and irrefiftible evidence: I mean, the fubject of pardons.

The very word to a reflecting mind is fraught with abfurdity. Their abfur-" What is the rule that ought in all cafes to prefcribe to my conduct ?" Surely juffice ; underftanding by juffice the greateft utility of the whole mais of beings that may be influenced by my "What then is clemency?" It can be nothing but conduct. the pitiable egotifm of him who imagines he can do fomething better than juffice. " Is it right that I fhould fuffer conftraint for a certain offence ?" The rectitude of my fuffering must be founded in its tendency to promote the general welfare. He therefore dity.

OF PARDONS.

BOOK VII. CHAP. IX.

therefore that pardons me, iniquitoufly prefers the imaginary intereft of an individual, and utterly neglects what he owes to the whole. He beftows that which I ought not to receive, and which he has no right to give. " Is it right on the contrary that I fhould not undergo the fuffering in queftion ? Will he by refcuing me from fuffering, do a benefit to me and no injury to others ?" He will then be a notorious delinquent, if he allow There is indeed a confiderable defect in this laft me to fuffer. If, while he benefits me, he do no injury to others, fuppofition. he is infallibly performing a public fervice. If I fuffered in the arbitrary manner which the fuppofition includes, the whole would fuftain an unqueftionable injury in the injuffice that was perpetrated. And yet the man who prevents this odious injuftice, has been accuftomed to arrogate to himfelf the attribute of clement, and the apparently fublime, but in reality tyrannical, name of forgiveness. For, if he do more than has been here defcribed, inftead of glory, he ought to take fhame to himfelf, as an enemy to the intereft of human kind. If every action, and efpecially every action in which the happiness of a rational being is concerned, be fusceptible of a certain rule, then caprice must be in all cafes excluded : there can be no action, which, if I neglect, I shall have difcharged my duty; and, if I perform, I shall be entitled to applaufe.

Their origin.

The pernicious effects of the fyftem of pardons is peculiarly glaring. It was first invented as the miserable supplement to a fanguinary fanguinary code, the atrocioufnefs of which was fo confpicuous, BOOK VII. that its ministers either dreaded the refistance of the people if it were indifcriminately executed, or themfelves fhrunk with fpontaneous repugnance from the devastation it commanded. The fyftem of pardons naturally affociates with the fyftem of law; for, though you may call every inftance in which one man occafions the death of another by the name of murder, yet the injuffice would be too great, to apply to all inftances the fame Define murder as accurately as you pleafe, the fame treatment. confequence, the fame difparity of cafes will obtrude itfelf. It is neceffary therefore to have a court of reafon, to which the decifions of a court of law shall be brought for revifal.

But how is this court, inexpreffibly more important than the Their abufes. other, to be conflituted? Here lies the effence of the matter; the reft is form. A jury is impanelled, to tell you the generical name of the action; a judge prefides, to read out of the vocabulary of law the fentence annexed to that name; laft of all, comes the court of enquiry which is to decide whether the remedy of the difpenfatory be fuitable to the circumftances of this particular cafe. This authority has ufually been lodged in the first instance with the judge, and in the last refort with the king in council. Now, laying afide the propriety or impropriety of this particular felection, there is one grievous abufe which ought to ftrike the moft fuperficial obferver. These perfons, with whom the principal truft is repofed, confider their functions in this BOOK VII. this refpect as a matter purely incidental, exercife them with fu-CHAP. IX. pinenefs, and in many inflances with the moft fcanty materials to guide their judgment. This grows in a confiderable degree out of the very name of pardon, which implies a work of fupererogatory benevolence.

783

OF PARDONS.

784

Their arbitrary character. From the manner in which pardons are difpenfed inevitably flows the uncertainty of punifhment. It is too evident that punifhment is inflicted by no certain rules, and of confequence thelives of a thousand victims are immolated in vain. Not more than one half or one third of the offenders whom the law condemns to death in this metropolis, are made to fuffer the fentence that is pronounced. Is it poffible that each offender should not flatter himfelf that he shall be among the number that escapes? Such a system, to speak it truly, is a lottery of death, in which each man draws his ticket for reprieve or execution, as undefinable accidents shall decide.

It may be afked whether the abolition of law would not produce equal uncertainty? By no means. The principles of king and council in fuch cafes are very little underflood, either by themfelves or others. The principles of a jury of his neighbours commiffioned to pronounce upon the whole of the cafe, the criminal eafily gueffes. He has only to appeal to his own fentiments and experience. Reafon is a thoufand times more explicit and intelligible than law; and when we were accuftomed to confult

OF PARDONS.

confult her, the certainty of her decifions would be fuch as men BOOK VII. CHAP practifed in our prefent courts are totally unable to conceive.

Another very important confequence grows out of the fyftem Defiructive of A fystem of pardons is a fystem of unmitigated of pardons. flavery. I am taught to expect a certain defirable event, from what? From the clemency, the uncontroled, unmerited kindnefs of a fellow mortal. Can any leffon be more degrading? The pufillanimous fervility of the man who devotes himfelf with everlafting obfequioufnefs to another, becaufe that other, having begun to be unjuft, relents in his career ; the ardour with which he confesses the rectitude of his fentence and the enormity of his deferts, will conftitute a tale that future ages will find it difficult to underftand.

What are the fentiments in this refpect that are alone worthy of a rational being? Give me that and that only, which without injuffice you cannot refuse. More than juffice it would be difgraceful for me to afk, and for you to beftow. I ftand upon the foundation of right. This is a title, which brute force may refufe to acknowledge, but which all the force in the world cannot annihilate. By refifting this plea you may prove yourfelf unjuft, but in yielding to it you grant me but my due. If, all things confidered, I be the fit fubject of a benefit, the benefit is merited : merit in any other fense is contradictory and absurd. If you bestow upon me unmerited advantage, you are a recreant from morality.

OF PARDONS.

BOOK VII. the general good. I may be base enough to thank you; but, if CHAP. IX. I were virtuous, I should condemn you.

Thefe fentiments alone are confiftent with true independence of mind. He that is accuftomed to regard virtue as an affair of favour and grace, cannot be eminently virtuous. If he occafionally perform an action of apparent kindnefs, he will applaud the generofity of his fentiments; and, if he abftain, he will acquit himfelf with the queftion, " May I not do what I will with my own?" In the fame manner, when he is treated benevolently by another, he will in the first place be unwilling to examine ftrictly into the reafonablenefs of this treatment, becaufe benevolence, as he imagines, is not fubject to any inflexibility of rule; and, in the fecond place, he will not regard his benefactor with that erect and unembarraffed mien, that complete fenfe of equality, which is the only immoveable bafis of virtue and happinefs. A N

ENQUIRY

CONCERNING

POLITICAL JUSTICE.

BOOK VIII.

OF PROPERTY.

CHAP. I.

GENUINE SYSTEM OF PROPERTY DELINEATED.

IMPORTANCE OF THIS TOPIC.—ABUSES TO WHICH IT HAS BEEN EXPOSED.—CRITERION OF PROPERTY: JUSTICE.— ENTITLES EACH MAN TO THE SUPPLY OF HIS ANIMAL WANTS AS FAR AS THE GENERAL STOCK WILL AFFORD IT—TO THE MEANS OF WELL BEING.—ESTIMATE OF LUXURY.—ITS PERNICIOUS EFFECTS ON THE INDIVI-DUAL WHO PARTAKES OF IT.—IDEA OF LABOUR AS THE FOUNDATION OF PROPERTY CONSIDERED.—ITS UNREA-5 H 2 SQNABLENESS.

2

GENUINE SYSTEM OF SONABLENESS. --- SYSTEM OF POPULAR MORALITY ON THIS SUBJECT .- DEFECTS OF THAT SYSTEM.

HE fubject of property is the key ftone that completes the BOOK VIII. r CHAP. I. fabric of political juffice. According as our ideas refpect-Importance ing it are crude or correct, they will enlighten us as to the conof this topic. fequences of a fimple form of fociety without government, and re-Book V. move the prejudices that attach us to complexity. There is nothing that more powerfully tends to diffort our judgment and opi-Book VI. nions, than erroneous notions concerning the goods of fortune. Book VII. Finally, the period that shall put an end to the fystem of coercion and puni/hment, is intimately connected with the circumftance of property's being placed upon an equitable bafis.

Abufes to which it has been exposed.

Various abufes of the most incontrovertible nature have infinuated themfelves into the administration of property. Each of these abuses might usefully be made the subject of a separate in-We might enquire into the vexations of this fort veftigation. that are produced by the dreams of national greatnefs or magiftratical vanity. This would lead us to a just estimate of the different kinds of taxation, landed or mercantile, having the neceffaries or the luxuries of life for their fubject of operation. We might examine into the abufes which have adhered to the commercial fystem; monopolies, charters, patents, protecting duties, prohibitions and bounties. We might remark upon the confequences that flow from the feudal fyftem and the fyftem of ranks :

788

PROPERTY DELINEATED.

ranks; feignorial duties, fines, conveyances, entails, eftates free- BOOK VIII. hold, copyhold and manorial, vaffalage and primogeniture. We might confider the rights of the church; first fruits and tithes: and we might enquire into the propriety of the regulation by which a man, after having poffeffed as fovereign a confiderable property during his life, is permitted to difpofe of it at his pleafure, at the period which the laws of nature feem to have fixed as the termination of his authority. All thefe enquiries would tend to fhow the incalculable importance of this fubject. But. excluding them all from the prefent enquiry, it fhall be the bufinefs of what remains of this work to confider, not any particular abufes which have incidentally rifen out of the administration of property, but those general principles by which it has in almost all cafes been directed, and which, if erroneous, must not only be regarded as the fource of the abufes above enumerated, but of others of innumerable kinds, too multifarious and fubtle to enter into fo brief a catalogue.

What is the criterion that muft determine whether this or that Criterion of property: fubftance, capable of contributing to the benefit of a human juffice. being, ought to be confidered as your property or mine? To this queftion there can be but one answer-Juffice. Let us then recur to the principles of juffice *.

To whom does any article of property, fuppole a loaf of bread, Entitles each man to the fupply of his * Book II, Chap. II. animal wants, as far as the juftly

CHAP. L

GENUINE SYSTEM OF

CHAP. I. general flock

790

BOOK VIII. juftly belong? To him who moft wants it, or to whom the poffeffion of it will be moft beneficial. Here are fix men famished will afford it : with hunger, and the loaf is, abfolutely confidered, capable of fatisfying the cravings of them all. Who is it that has a reafonable claim to benefit by the qualities with which this loaf is endowed? They are all brothers perhaps, and the law of primogeniture beftows it exclusively on the eldeft. But does iuftice confirm this award ? The laws of different countries difpole of property in a thousand different ways; but there can be but one way which is most conformable to reason.

> It would have been eafy to put a cafe much ftronger than that which has just been stated. I have an hundred loaves in my poffeffion, and in the next ftreet there is a poor man expiring with hunger, to whom one of thefe loaves would be the means of preferving his life. If I withhold this loaf from him, am I not unjuft ? If I impart it, am I not complying with what juffice demands? To whom does the loaf juftly belong?

I suppose myself in other respects to be in easy circumftances. and that I do not want this bread as an object of barter or fale, to procure me any of the other neceffaries of a human being. Our animal wants have long fince been defined, and are flated to confift of food, clothing and fhelter. If juffice have any meaning, nothing can be more iniquitous, than for one man to poffefs fuperfluities, perfluities, while there is a human being in existence that is not BOOK VIII CHAP. I. adequately fupplied with thefe.

PROPERTY DELINEATED.

Juffice does not ftop here. Every man is entitled, fo far as to the mean of well being, the general flock will fuffice, not only to the means of being, but of well being. It is unjuft, if one man labour to the deftruction of his health or his life, that another man may abound in luxuries. It is unjuft, if one man be deprived of leifure to cultivate his rational powers, while another man contributes not a fingle effort to add to the common flock. The faculties of one man are like the faculties of another man. Justice directs that each man, unless perhaps he be employed more beneficially to the public, fhould contribute to the cultivation of the common harveft, of which each man confumes a fhare. This reciprocity indeed, as was obferved when that fubject was the matter of feparate confideration, is of the very effence of juffice. How the latter branch of it, the neceffary labour, is to be fecured, while each man is admitted to claim his fhare of the produce, we fhall prefently have occafion to enquire.

This fubject will be placed in a fiill more firiking light, if we Effimate of laxury, reflect for a moment on the nature of luxuries. The wealth of any flate may intelligibly enough be confidered as the aggregate. of all the incomes, which are annually confumed within that flate, without deftroying the materials of an equal confumption in.

GENUINE SYSTEM OF

BOOK VIII. CHAP. I. in the enfuing year. Confidering this income as being, what in almost all cafes it will be found to be, the produce of the industry of the inhabitants, it will follow that in civilifed countries the peafant often does not confume more than the twentieth part of the produce of his labour, while his rich neighbour confumes perhaps the produce of the labour of twenty peafants. The benefit that arifes to this favoured mortal ought furely to be very extraordinary.

Its pernicious effects on the individual who partakes of it.

But nothing is more evident than that the condition of this man is the reverfe of beneficial. The man of an hundred pounds per annum, if he understand his own happiness, is a thousand times more favourably circumftanced. What shall the rich man do with his enormous wealth ? Shall he eat of innumerable diffees of the most expensive viands, or pour down hogsheads of the most highly flavoured wines? A frugal diet will contribute infinitely more to health, to a clear underftanding, to chearful fpirits, and even to the gratification of the appetites. Almost every other expence is an expence of oftentation. No man, but the most fordid epicure, would long continue to maintain even a plentiful table, if he had no fpectators, vifitors or fervants, to behold his eftablifhment. For whom are our fumptuous palaces and coftly furniture, our equipages, and even our very clothes ? The nobleman, who should for the first time let his imagination loofe to conceive the ftyle in which he would live, if he had nobody to obferve, ø

PROPERTY DELINEATED.

obferve, and no eye to pleafe but his own, would no doubt be BOOK VIII furprifed to find that vanity had been the first mover in all his _______ actions.

The object of this vanity is to procure the admiration and applaufe of beholders. We need not here enter into the intrinfic value of applaufe. Taking it for granted that it is as effimable an acquifition as any man can fuppofe it, how contemptible is the fource of applaufe to which the rich man has recourfe ? " Applaud me, becaufe my anceftor has left me a great eftate." What merit is there in that? The first effect then of riches is to deprive their poffeffor of the genuine powers of underftanding, and render him incapable of differning abfolute truth. They lead him to fix his affections on objects not accommodated to the wants and the ftructure of the human mind, and of confequence entail upon him difappointment and unhappinefs. The greateft of all perfonal advantages are, independence of mind, which makes us feel that our fatisfactions are not at the mercy either of men or of fortune; and activity of mind, the chearfulnefs that arifes from industry perpetually employed about objects, of which our judgment acknowledges the intrinfic value.

In this cafe we have compared the happines of the man of extreme opulence with that of the man of one hundred pounds per annum. But the latter fide of this alternative was affumed merely in compliance with existing prejudices. Even in the prefent

793

GENUINE SYSTEM OF

CHAP. I.

prefent flate of human fociety we perceive, that a man, who fhould be perpetually earning the neceffary competence by a very moderate induftry, and with his purfuits uncroffed by the peevifhnefs or caprice of his neighbours, would not be lefs happy than if he were born to that competence. In the flate of fociety we are here contemplating, where, as will prefently appear, the requifite induftry will be of the lighteft kind, it will be the reverfe of a misfortune to any man, to find himfelf neceffarily flimulated to a gentle activity, and in confequence to feel that no reverfe of fortune could deprive him of the means of fubfiftence and contentment,

Idea of labour as the foundation of property confidered.

But it has been alledged, " that we find among different men very different degrees of labour and induftry, and that it is not juft they fhould receive an equal reward." It cannot indeed be denied that the attainments of men in virtue and ufefulnefs ought by no means to be confounded. How far the prefent fyftem of property contributes to their being equitably treated it is very eafy to determine. The prefent fyftem of property confers on one man immenfe wealth in confideration of the accident of his birth. He that from beggary afcends to opulence, is ufually known not to have effected this transition by methods very creditable to his honefty or his ufefulnefs. The moft induftrious and active member of fociety is frequently with great difficulty able to keep his family from flarving.

1.251

and begin in to a produce ?

top the sec

PROPERTY DELINEATED.

But, to pass over these iniquitous effects of the unequal distri- BOOK VIII. bution of property, let us confider the nature of the reward Its unreawhich is thus propofed to industry. If you be industrious, you fonablenefs. shall have an hundred times more food than you can eat, and an hundred times more clothes than you can wear. Where is the juffice of this? If I be the greatest benefactor the human species ever knew, is that a reafon for beftowing on me what I do not want, especially when there are thousands to whom my superfluity would be of the greateft advantage? With this fuperfluity I can purchafe nothing but gaudy oftentation and envy, nothing but the pitiful pleafure of returning to the poor under the name of generofity that to which reafon gives them an irrefiftible claim, nothing but prejudice, error and vice.

The doctrine of the injuffice of accumulated property has been Syftem of the foundation of all religious morality. The object of this mo- rality on this. rality has been, to excite men by individual virtue to repair this The most energetic teachers of religion have been irinjuffice. refiftibly led to affert the precife truth upon this interefting fubject. They have taught the rich, that they hold their wealth only as a truft, that they are firifily accountable for every atom of their expenditure, that they are merely administrators, and by no means proprietors in chief*. The defect of this fyftem is, that they rather excite us to palliate our injuffice than to forfake it.

* See Swift's Sermon on Mutual Subjection, quoted Book II, Chap. II, in al solid popular mo-

5 I 2

No

CHAP, I.

GENUINE SYSTEM OF BOOK VIII. CHAP. I.

No truth can be more fimple than that which they inculcate. There is no action of any human being, and certainly no action that refpects the difpolition of property, that is not capable of better and worfe, and concerning which reafon and morality do not prefcribe a fpecific conduct. He that fets out with acknowledging that other men are of the fame nature as himfelf, and is capable of perceiving the precife place he would hold in the eye of an impartial fpectator, must be fully fensible, that the money he employs in procuring an object of triffing or no advantage to himfelf, and which might have been employed in purchasing fubftantial and indifpenfible benefit to another, is unjuftly employed. He that looks at his property with the eye of truth, will find that every shilling of it has received its deftination from the dictates of juffice. He will at the fame time however be exposed to confiderable pain, in confequence of his own ignorance as to the precife difpolition that juffice and public utility require.

Does any man doubt of the truth of these affertions? Does any man doubt that, when I employ a fum of money fmall or great in the purchase of an absolute luxury for myself, I am guilty of vice? It is high time that this subject should be adequately understood. It is high time that we should lay aside the very names of juffice and virtue, or that we should acknowledge that they do not authorise us to accumulate luxuries upon ourfelves, while we see others in want of the indispensible means of improvement and happiness.

But,

PROPERTY DELINEATED.

But, while religion inculcated on mankind the impartial nabook VIII, ture of juffice, its teachers have been too apt to treat the practice of juffice, not as a debt, which it ought to be confidered,  $D_{\text{cfecfs of}}$ but as an affair of fpontaneous generofity and bounty. They have called upon the rich to be clement and merciful to the poor. The confequence of this has been that the rich, when they beftowed the moft flender pittance of their enormous wealth in acts of charity, as they were called, took merit to themfelves for what they gave, inftead of confidering themfelves as delinquents for what they withheld.

Religion is in reality in all its parts an accommodation to the prejudices and weakneffes of mankind. Its authors communicated to the world as much truth, as they calculated that the world would be willing to receive. But it is time that we fhould lay afide the inftruction intended only for children in underftanding *, and contemplate the nature and principles of things. If religion had fpoken out, and told us it was juft that all men fhould receive the fupply of their wants, we fhould prefently have been led to fufpect that a gratuitous diffribution to be made by the rich, was a very indirect and ineffectual way of arriving at this object. The experience of all ages has taught us, that this fyftem is productive only of a very precarious fupply. The principal object which it feems to propofe, is to place this fupply in the difpofal of a few, enabling them to make a fhow of generofity

* 1 Cor. Chap. III. Ver. 1, 2.

Christ langthet nearly this.

GENUINE SYSTEM, &c.

BOOK VIII. CHAP. I.

798

generofity with what is not truly their own, and to purchafe the gratitude of the poor by the payment of a debt. It is a fyftem of elemency and charity, inftead of a fyftem of juffice. It fills the rich with unreafonable pride by the fpurious denominations with which it decorates their acts, and the poor with fervility, by leading them to regard the flender comforts they obtain, not as their incontrovertible due, but as the good pleafure and the grace of their opulent neighbours.

CHAP.

[ 799 ]

CHAP. II.

BENEFITS ARISING FROM THE GENUINE SYSTEM OF PROPERTY.

CONTRASTED WITH THE MISCHIEFS OF THE PRESENT SYS-TEM, AS CONSISTING-I. IN A SENSE OF DEPENDENCE. 2. IN THE PERPETUAL SPECTACLE OF INJUSTICE, LEAD-ING MEN ASTRAY IN THEIR DESIRES -AND PERVERTING THE INTEGRITY OF THEIR JUDGMENTS .--- THE RICH ARE THE TRUE PENSIONERS .--- 3. IN THE DISCOURAGEMENT OF INTELLECTUAL ATTAINMENTS .--- 4. IN THE MULTI-PLICATION OF VICE-GENERATING THE CRIMES OF THE POOR-THE PASSIONS OF THE RICH-AND THE MISFOR-TUNES OF WAR .--- 5. IN DEPOPULATION.

AVING feen the juffice of an equal diffribution of property, let us next confider the benefits with which it would be attended. And here with grief it must be confessed, that, with the mifhowever great and extensive are the evils that are produced by prefent fyfmonarchies and courts, by the imposfure of priefts and the ini- filling: quity of criminal laws, all thefe are imbeeil and impotent compared with the evils that arife out of the eftablished fyftem of property.

BOOK VIII. CHAP. II.

Contrailed chiefs of the tem, as con-

BENEFITS ARISING FROM THE

Its first effect is that which we have already mentioned, a fense of dependence. It is true that courts are mean spirited, intriguing and fervile, and that this difpolition is transferred by contagion from them to all ranks of fociety. But property brings home a fervile and truckling fpirit by no circuitous method to every houfe in the nation. Obferve the pauper fawning with abject vileness upon his rich benefactor, and speechless with fenfations of gratitude for having received that, which he ought to have claimed with an erect mien, and with a confcioufnefs that his claim was irrefiftible. Obferve the fervants that follow in a rich man's train, watchful of his looks, anticipating his commands, not daring to reply to his infolence, all their time and their efforts under the direction of his caprice. Observe the tradefman, how he fludies the paffions of his cuftomers, not to correct, but to pamper them, the vileness of his flattery and the fystematical constancy with which he exaggerates the merit of his commodities. / Observe the practices of a popular election, where the great mass are purchased by obsequiousness, by intemperance and bribery, or driven by unmanly threats of poverty and perfecution. /Indeed " the age of chivalry is" not " gone *!" The feudal fpirit still furvives, that reduced the great mass of mankind to the rank of flaves and cattle for the fervice of a few.

We have heard much of visionary and theoretical improvements. It would indeed be visionary and theoretical to expect * Burke's Reflections.

CHAP. II.

. in a fenfe of dependence :

We confine when we we s.

6

virtue

virtue from mankind, while they are thus fubjected to hourly corruption, and bred from father to fon to fell their independence and their confcience for the vile rewards that oppreffion has to No man can be either ufeful to others or happy to beftow. himfelf who is a ftranger to the grace of firmnefs, and who is not habituated to prefer the dictates of his own fenfe of rectitude to all the tyranny of command, and allurements of temptation. Here again, as upon a former occasion, religion comes in to illustrate our thefis. Religion was the generous ebullition of men. who let their imagination loofe on the grandeft fubjects, and wandered without reftraint in the unbounded field of enquiry. It is not to be wondered at therefore if they brought home imperfect ideas of the fublimeft views that intellect can furnish. In this inftance religion teaches that the true perfection of man is to divest himself of the influence of passions; that he must have no artificial wants, no fenfuality, and no fear. But to diveft the human species under the present system of the influence of passions is an extravagant fpeculation. The enquirer after truth and the benefactor of mankind will be defirous of removing from them those external impressions by which their evil propensities are cherifhed. The true object that fhould be kept in view, is to extirpate all ideas of condefcenfion and fuperiority, to oblige every man to feel, that the kindnefs he exerts is what he is bound to perform, and the affiftance he afks what he has a right to claim.

CHAP. II.

Sor

5 K

A fecond

BENEFITS ARISING FROM THE

BOOK VIII. CHAP. II.

2. in the perpetual fpectacle of injuffice : leading men aftray in their defires :

A fecond evil that arifes out of the eftablished fystem of property is the perpetual fpectacle of injuffice it exhibits. This confifts partly in luxury and partly in caprice. There is nothing more pernicious to the human mind than luxury. Mind. being in its own nature effentially active, neceffarily fixes on fome object public or perfonal, and in the latter cafe on the attainment of fome excellence, or fomething which shall command the efteem and deference of others. No propenfity, abfolutely confidered, can be more valuable than this. But the eftablished fyftem of property directs it into the channel of the acquifition of wealth. The oftentation of the rich perpetually goads the fpectator to the defire of opulence. Wealth, by the fentiments of fervility and dependence it produces, makes the rich man ftand forward as the only object of general effeem and deference. In vain are fobriety, integrity and industry, in vain the fublimest powers of mind and the most ardent benevolence, if their possesfor be narrowed in his circumftances. To acquire wealth and to difplay it, is therefore the universal paffion. The whole ftructure of human fociety is made a fyftem of the narroweft felfifhnefs. If felf love and benevolence were apparently reconciled as to their object, a man might fet out with the defire of eminence, and yet every day become more generous and philanthropical in his views. But the paffion we are here defcribing is accuftomed to be gratified at every flep, by inhumanly trampling upon the intereft of others. Wealth is acquired by overreaching our neighbours, and is fpent in infulting them. The

302

GENUINE SYSTEM OF PROPERTY.

The fpectacle of injuffice which the established fystem of property exhibits, confifts partly in caprice. If you would cherifh in any man the love of rectitude, you must take care that its prin- ing the inteciples be imprefied on him, not only by words, but actions. fometimes happens during the period of education, that maxims of integrity and confiftency are repeatedly inforced, and that the preceptor gives no quarter to the bale fuggeftions of felfifnneis and cunning. But how is the leffon that has been read to the pupil confounded and reverfed, when he enters upon the fcene of the world? If he afk, " Why is this man honoured ?" the ready anfwer is, " Becaufe he is rich." If he enquire farther, " Why is he rich ?" the answer in most cafes is, " From the accident of birth, or from a minute and fordid attention to the cares of gain." The fystem of accumulated property is the offspring of civil policy; and civil policy, as we are taught to believe, is the production of accumulated wifdom. Thus the wifdom of legiflators and fenates has been employed, to fecure a diffribution of property the most profligate and unprincipled, that bids defiance to the maxims of juffice and the nature of man. Humanity weeps over the diftreffes of the peafantry of all civilifed nations; and, when the turns from this fpectacle to behold the luxury of their lords, groß, imperious and prodigal, her fenfations certainly are not lefs acute. This fpectacle is the fchool in which mankind have been educated. They have been accuftomed to the fight of injuffice, oppreffion and iniquity, till their feelings are made 5 K 2 callous,

× .

BCOK VIII. CHAP. II. and pervertgrity of their It judgments.

and the Chick Islover

BENEFITS ARISING FROM THE #### BOOK VIII. CHAP. II.

callous, and their understandings incapable of apprehending the nature of true virtue.

The rich are the true penfioners. In beginning to point out the evils of accumulated property, we compared the extent of those evils with the correspondent evils of monarchies and courts. No circumstances under the latter have excited a more pointed disapprobation than pensions and pecuniary corruption, by means of which hundreds of individuals are rewarded, not for ferving, but betraying the public, and the hard earnings of industry are employed to fatten the fervile adherents of despotism. But the rent roll of the lands of England is a much more formidable pension lift, than that which is supposed to be employed in the purchase of ministerial majorities. All riches, and especially all hereditary riches, are to be confidered as the falary of a finecure office, where the labourer and the manufacturer perform the duties, and the principal spends the income in luxury and idleness*. Hereditary wealth is in reality a premium paid to idleness, * This idea is to be found in Ogilvie's Effay on the Right of Property in Land, publifhed about two years ago, Part I, Sect. iii, par. 38, 39. The reafonings of this author have fometimes confiderable merit, though he has by no means gone to the fource of the evil.

It might be amufing to fome readers to recollect the authorities, if the citation of authorities were a proper mode of reafoning, by which the fyftem of accumulated property is openly attacked. The best known is Plato in his treatife of a Republic.

GENUINE SYSTEM OF PROPERTY.

nefs, an immenfe annuity expended to retain mankind in brutality and ignorance. The poor are kept in ignorance by the want of leifure. The rich are furnished indeed with the means of cultivation and literature, but they are paid for being diffipated and indolent. The most powerful means that malignity could have invented, are employed to prevent them from improving their talents, and becoming useful to the public.

BOOK VIII. CHAP. II.

805

This leads us to observe, thirdly, that the established fystem 3. In the dif-

Republic. His fteps have been followed by fir Thomas More in his Utopia. Specimens of very powerful reafoning on the fame fide may be found in Gulliver's Travels, particularly, Part IV, Chap. VI. Mably, in his book De la Ligiflation, has difplayed at large the advantages of equality, and then quits the fubject in defpair from an opinion of the incorrigiblenefs of human depravity. Wallace, the contemporary and antagonift of Hume, in a treatife entitled, Various Profpects of Mankind, Nature and Providence, is copious in his eulogium of the fame fyftem, and deferts it only from fear of the earth becoming too populous: fee below, Chap. VII. The great practical authorities are Crete, Sparta, Peru and Paraguay. It would be eafy to fwell this lift, if we added examples where. an approach only to thefe principles was attempted, and authors who have incidentally confirmed a doctrine, fo interefting and clear, as never to have been wholly eradicated from any human underftanding.

It would be trifling to object that the fyftems of Plato and others are full of imperfections. This indeed rather ftrengthens their authority; fince the evidence of the truth they maintained was fo great, as ftill to preferve its hold on their underftandings, though they knew not how to remove the difficulties that attended it.

of

BENEFITS ARISING FROM THE

BOOK VIII. CHAP. II. of intellectual attainments. of property, is the true levelling fystem with respect to the human fpecies, by as much as the cultivation of intellect and truth, is more valuable and more characteristic of man, than the gratifications of vanity or appetite." Accumulated property treads the powers of thought in the duft, extinguishes the foarks of genius, and reduces the great mafs of mankind to be immerfed in fordid cares; befide depriving the rich, as we have already faid, of the most falubrious and effectual motives to activity. If fuperfluity were banished, the necessity for the greater part of the manual industry of mankind would be fuperfeded ; and the reft, being amicably fhared among all the active and vigorous members of the community, would be burthenfome to none. Every man would have a frugal, yet wholfome diet : every man would go forth to that moderate exercise of his corporal functions that would give hilarity to the fpirits; none would be made torpid with fatigue, but all would have leifure to cultivate the kindly and philanthropical affections of the foul, and to let loofe his faculties in the fearch of intellectual improvement. What a contraft does this fcene prefent us with the prefent flate of human fociety, where the peafant and the labourer work, till their underftandings are benumbed with toil, their finews contracted and made callous by being for ever on the ftretch, and their bodies invaded with infirmities and furrendered to an untimely grave? What is the fruit of this difproportioned and unceasing toil? At evening they return to a family, famished with hunger, exposed half naked to the inclemencies  $\mathbf{2}$ clemencies of the fky, hardly fheltered, and denied the flendereft inftruction, unlefs in a few inftances, where it is difpenfed by the hands of oftentatious charity, and the first leffon communicated is unprincipled fervility. All this while their rich neighbour—but we vifited him beforc.

806

GENUINE SYSTEM OF PROPERTY.

How rapid and fublime would be the advances of intellect, if all men were admitted into the field of knowledge ? At prefent ninety-nine perfons in an hundred are no more excited to any regular exertions of general and curious thought, than the brutes themfelves. What would be the flate of public mind in a nation, where all were wife, all had laid afide the fhackles of prejudice and implicit faith, all adopted with fearlefs confidence the fuggestions of truth, and the lethargy of the foul was difmiffed for ever? It is to be prefumed that the inequality of mind would in a certain degree be permanent; but it is reafonable to believe that the geniufes of fuch an age would far furpafs the grandeft exertions of intellect that are at prefent known. Genius would not be depreffed with falfe wants and niggardly patronage. It would not exert itfelf with a fenfe of neglect and oppreffion rankling in its bofom. It would be freed from those apprehenfions that perpetually recal us to the thought of perfonal emolument, and of confequence would expatiate freely among fentiments of generofity and public good.

From ideas of intellectual let us turn to moral improvement. 4. in the multiplica-And here it is obvious that all the occasions of crime would be tion of vice.

BENEFITS ARISING FROM THE BOOK VIII. cut off for ever. All men love juffice. All men are confcious portited that man is a being of one common nature, and feel the propriety of the treatment they receive from one other being meafured by a common flandard. Every man is defirous of affifting another; whether we fhould choose to ascribe this to an inftinct implanted in his nature which renders this conduct a fource of perfonal gratification, or to his perception of the reafonableness of fuch affistance. So necessary a part is this of the conftitution of mind, that no man perpetrates any action however criminal, without having first invented fome fophistry, fome palliation, by which he proves to himfelf that it is beft to The crimes of be done *. Hence it appears, that offence, the invation of one the poor. man upon the fecurity of another, is a thought alien to mind, and which nothing could have reconciled to us but the fharp fting of neceffity. To confider merely the prefent order of human fociety, it is evident that the first offence must have been his who began a monopoly, and took advantage of the weaknefs of his neighbours to fecure certain exclusive privileges to himfelf. The man on the other hand who determined to put an end to this monopoly, and who peremptorily demanded what was fuperfluous to the poffeffor and would be of extreme benefit to himfelf, appeared to his own mind to be merely avenging the violated laws of juffice. Were it not for the plaufiblenefs of this apology, it is to be prefumed that there would be no fuch thing as crime in the world.

808

* Book II, Chap. III, p. 98.

The

GENUINE SYSTEM OF PROPERTY.

The fruitful fource of crimes confifts in this circumftance, BOOK VIII. one man's poffeffing in abundance that of which another man is deftitute. We must change the nature of mind, before we can prevent it from being powerfully influenced by this circumftance, when brought flrongly home to its perceptions by the nature of its fituation. Man must cease to have fenses, the pleasures of appetite and vanity must ceafe to gratify, before he can look on tamely at the monopoly of these pleasures. He must cease to have a fenfe of juffice, before he can clearly and fully approve this mixed scene of superfluity and distress. It is true that the proper method of curing this inequality is by reafon and not by violence. But the immediate tendency of the eftablished syftem is to perfuade men that reafon is impotent. The injuffice of which they complain is upheld by force, and they are too eafily induced, by force to attempt its correction. All they endeavour is the partial correction of an injuffice, which education tells them is neceffary, but more powerful reafon affirms to be tyrannical.

Force grew out of monopoly. It might accidentally have occurred among favages whofe appetites exceeded their fupply, or whole paffions were inflamed by the prefence of the object of their defire; but it would gradually have died away, as reafon and civilifation advanced. Accumulated property has fixed its empire; and henceforth all is an open contention of the firength and cunning of one party against the strength and cunning of thor by sheak my Mileseny - pro-10000 100 Million of the active and marrie point france

800

the

BENEFITS ARISING FROM THE BOOK VIII. CHAP. II.

810

the other. In this cafe the violent and premature ftruggles of the neceffitous are undoubtedly an evil. They tend to defeat the very caule in the fuccefs of which they are most deeply interested; they tend to procrassinate the triumph of truth. But the true crime is in the malevolent and partial propensities of men, thinking only of themselves, and despissing the emolument of others; and of these the rich have their start.

The fpirit of oppreffion, the fpirit of fervility, and the fpirit of fraud, thefe are the immediate growth of the established fystem of property. These are alike hostile to intellectual and The other vices of envy, malice and moral improvement. revenge are their infeparable companions. In a flate of fociety where men lived in the midft of plenty, and where all fhared alike the bounties of nature, thefe fentiments would inevitably expire. The narrow principle of felfifhnefs would vanish. No man being obliged to guard his little flore, or provide with anxiety and pain for his reftlefs wants, each would lofe his own individual existence in the thought of the general good. No man would be an enemy to his neighbour, for they would have nothing for which to contend; and of confequence philanthropy would refume the empire which reafon affigns her. Mind would be delivered from her perpetual anxiety about corporal fupport, and free to expatiate in the field of thought which is ongenial to her. Each man would affift the enquiries of all.

GENUINE SYSTEM OF PROPERTY.

Let us fix our attention for a moment upon the revolution of BOOK VIII. principles and habits that immediately grow out of an unequal diffribution of property. Till it was thus diffributed men felt of the rich : what their wants required, and fought the fupply of those wants. All that was more than this, was regarded as indifferent. But no fooner is accumulation introduced, than they begin to ftudy a variety of methods, for difpoling of their luperfluity with leaft emolument to their neighbour, or in other words by which it fhall appear to be most their own. They do not long continue to buy commodities, before they begin to buy men. He that poffeffes or is the fpectator of fuperfluity foon difcovers the hold which it affords us on the minds of others. Hence the paffions of vanity and oftentation. Hence the defpotic manners of them. who recollect with complacence the rank they occupy, and the reftlefs ambition of those whose attention is engroffed by the poffible future.

Ambition is of all the paffions of the human mind the moft war. extensive in its ravages. It adds diffrict to diffrict, and kingdom to kingdom. It fpreads bloodfhed and calamity and conqueft over the face of the earth. But the paffion itfelf, as well as the means of gratifying it, is the produce of the prevailing fystem of property*. It is only by means of accumulation that one man obtains an unrefifted fway over multitudes of others. It is by means of a certain diffribution of income that the prefent govern-

> * Book V, Chap. XVI. 5 L 2

СНАР. И.

the paffions

ments

BENEFITS ARISING FROM THE BOOK VIII. CHAP. II.

812

ments of the world are retained in existence. Nothing more eafy than to plunge nations fo organifed into war. But. if Europe were at prefent covered with inhabitants, all of them poffeffing competence, and none of them fuperfluity, what could induce its different countries to engage in hoftility? If you would lead men to war, you must exhibit certain allurements. If you be not enabled by a fyftem, already prevailing and which derives force from prefcription, to hire them to your purposes, you must bring over each individual by dint of perfuafion. How hopelefs a tafk by fuch means to excite mankind to murder each other? It is clear then that war in every horrid form is the growth of unequal property. As long as this fource of jealoufy and corruption shall remain, it is visionary to talk of universal peace. As foon as the fource shall be dried up, it will be impossible to exclude the confequence. It is property that forms men-into one common mafs, and makes them fit to be played upon like at brute machine. Were this flumbling block removed, each man. would be united to his neighbour in love and mutual kindnefs all thousand times more than now : but each man would think and judge for himfelf. Let then the advocates for the prevailing fyftem, at leaft confider what it is for which they plead, and be well affured that they have arguments in its favour which will . weigh against these difadvantages.

5. in depopulation. There is one other circumftance which, though inferior to those above enumerated, deferves to be mentioned. This is population,

GENUINE SYSTEM OF PROPERTY.

tion. It has been calculated that the average cultivation of Eu- BOOK VIII. rope might be improved, fo as to maintain five times her prefent number of inhabitants *. There is a principle in human fociety by which population is perpetually kept down to the level of the Thus among the wandering tribes of means of fublifience. America and Afia, we never find through the lapfe of ages, that population has fo increafed, as to render neceffary the cultivation of the earth. Thus, among the civilifed nations of Europe, by means of territorial monopoly the fources of fubfiftence are kept within a certain limit, and, if the population became overflocked, the lower ranks of the inhabitants would be ftill more incapable. of procuring for themfelves the neceffaries of life. There are no doubt extraordinary concurrences of circumstances, by means of which changes are occafionally introduced in this refpect; but in ordinary cafes the flandard of population is held in a manner flationary for centuries. Thus the eftablished fystem of property may be confidered as ftrangling a confiderable portion of our children in their cradle. Whatever may be the value of the life of man, or rather whatever would be his capability of happines in a free and equal flate of fociety, the fystem we are here oppoling may be confidered as arrefting upon the threshold of ex-iftence four fifths of that value and that happinefs.

* Ogilvie, Part I, Sect. iii, par. 35.

CHAP. II.

CHAP?

- [ 814 ]

CHAP. III.

OF THE OBJECTION TO THIS SYSTEM FROM THE ADMIRABLE EFFECTS OF LUXURY.

NATURE OF THE OBJECTION.—LUXURY NOT NECESSARY— EITHER TO POPULATION—OR TO THE IMPROVEMENT OF THE MIND.—ITS TRUE CHARACTER.

BOOK VIII. CHAP. III. THESE ideas of juffice and improvement are as old as literature and reflexion themfelves. They have fuggefted themfelves in detached parts to the inquifitive in all ages, though they have perhaps never been brought together fo as fufficiently to ftrike the mind with their confiftency and beauty. But, after having furnished an agreeable dream, they have perpetually been laid afide as impracticable. We will proceed to examine the objections upon which this fupposed impracticability has been founded; and the answer to these objections will gradually lead us to fuch a development of the proposed fystem, as by its completeness and the regular adjustment of its parts will be calculated to carry conviction to the most prejudiced mind.

Nature of the objection.

There is one objection that has chiefly been cultivated on Englifh ground, and to which we will give the priority of examination.

OF THE SUPPOSED ADVANTAGES, &c.

It has been affirmed " that private vices are public bene- BOOK VIII. tion. fits." But this principle, thus coarfely flated by one of its original advocates *, was remodelled by his more elegant fucceffors +. They observed, " that the true measure of virtue and vice was utility, and confequently that it was an unreafonable calumny to ftate luxury as a vice. Luxury," they faid, " whatever might be the prejudices that cynics and afcetics had excited againft it, was the rich and generous foil that brought to perfection the true profperity of mankind. Without luxury men must always have remained folitary favages. It is luxury by which palaces are built and cities peopled. How could there have been high population in any country, without the various arts in which the fwarms of its inhabitants are bufied? The true benefactor of mankind is not the fcrupulous devotee who by his charities encourages infenfibility and floth; is not the furly philosopher who reads them lectures of barren morality; but the elegant voluptuary who employs thousands in fober and healthful industry to procure dainties for his table, who unites diftant nations in commerce to fupply him with furniture, and who encourages the fine arts and all the fublimities of invention to furnish decorations for his refidence."

I have brought forward this objection, rather that nothing ma- Luxury not neceffary, either to population:

* Mandeville : Fable of the Bees.

+ Coventry, in a treatife entitled, Philemon to Hydafpes : Hume; Effays, Part II, Effay II.

terial.

CHAP. III.

OF THE SUPPOSED ADVANTAGES

BOOK VIII. terial might appear to be omitted, than becaufe it requires a fepa-CHAP. III. rate answer. The true answer has been anticipated. It has been feen that the population of any country is meafured by its cultivation. If therefore fufficient motives can be furnished to excite men to agriculture, there is no doubt, that population may be carried on to any extent that the land can be made to maintain. But agriculture, when once begun, is never found to ftop in its career, but from politive difcountenance. It is territorial monopoly that obliges men unwillingly to fee vaft tracts of land lying wafte, or negligently and imperfectly cultivated, while they are fubjected to the miferies of want. If land were perpetually open to him who was willing to cultivate it, it is not to be believed but that it would be cultivated in proportion to the wants of the community, nor by the fame reafon would there be any effectual check to the increase of population.

or to the improvement of the mind. Undoubtedly the quantity of manual labour would be greatly inferior to that which is now performed by the inhabitants of any civilifed country, fince at prefent perhaps one twentieth part of the inhabitants performs the agriculture which fupports the whole. But it is by no means to be admitted that this leifure would be found a real calamity.

Its true chrracter. As to what fort of a benefactor the voluptuary is to mankind, this was fufficiently feen when we treated of the effects of dependence and injuffice. To this fpecies of benefit all the crimes and and moral evils of mankind are indebted for their perpetuity. If BOOK VIII. CHAP. III. mind be to be preferred to mere animal existence, if it ought to be the wifh of every reafonable enquirer, not merely that man, but that happiness should be propagated, then is the voluptuary the bane of the human fpecies.

OF LUXURY.

CHAP.

[ 818 ]

CHAP. IV.

OF THE OBJECTION TO THIS SYSTEM FROM THE ALLUREMENTS OF SLOTH.

THE OBJECTION STATED.—SUCH A STATE OF SOCIETY MUST HAVE BEEN PRECEDED BY GREAT INTELLECTUAL IMPROVEMENT.—THE MANUAL LABOUR REQUIRED IN THIS STATE WILL BE EXTREMELY SMALL.—UNIVERSA-LITY OF THE LOVE OF DISTINCTION.—OPERATION OF THIS MOTIVE UNDER THE SYSTEM IN QUESTION—WILL FINALLY BE SUPERSEDED BY A BETTER MOTIVE.

BOOK VIII. CHAP. IV.

The objection flated. A NOTHER objection which has been urged againft the fyftem which counteracts the accumulation of property, is, "that it would put an end to induftry. We behold in commercial countries the miracles that are operated by the love of gain. Their inhabitants cover the fea with their fleets, aftonifh mankind by the refinement of their ingenuity, hold vaft continents in fubjection in diftant parts of the world by their arms, are able to defy the most powerful confederacies, and, oppreffed with taxes and debts, feem to acquire fresh prosperity under their accumulated burthens. Shall we lightly part with a fystem that feems pregnant with fuch inexhaustible motives? Shall we believe that men will cultivate affiduoufly what they have no affurance

OF THEPROPENSITY. &c.

ance they shall be permitted to apply to their personal emolu- BOOK VIII; ment? It will perhaps be found with agriculture as it is with commerce, which then flourishes best when subjected to no control, but, when placed under rigid reftraints, languishes and expires. Once eftablish it as a principle in fociety that no man is to apply to his perfonal use more than his neceffities require, and you will find every man become indifferent to those exertions which now call forth the energy of his faculties. Man is the creature of fenfations; and, when we endeavour to ftrain his intellect, and govern him by reafon alone, we do but fhow our ignorance of his nature. Self love is the genuine fource of our actions *, and, if this fhould be found to bring vice and partiality along with it, yet the fystem that should endeavour to superfede it, would be at beft no more than a beautiful romance. If each man found that, without being compelled to exert his own induftry, he might lay claim to the fuperfluity of his neighbour. indolence would perpetually usurp his faculties, and fuch a fociety must either starve, or be obliged in its own defence to return to that fyftem of injuffice and fordid intereft, which theoretical reafoners will for ever arraign to no purpofe."

This is the principal objection that prevents men from yielding without refiftance to the accumulated evidence that has already been adduced. In reply, it may be observed in the first place, that the equality for which we are pleading is an equality provement,

Such a flate of fociety muft have been preceded. by great intellectural im-

5 M 2

that 819

CHAP. IV.

* For an examination of this principle fee Book IV, Chap. VIII.

OF THE PROPENSITY

BOOK VIII. CHAP. IV.

820

that would fucceed to a ftate of great intellectual improvement. So bold a revolution cannot take place in human affairs, till the general mind has been highly cultivated. The prefent age of mankind is greatly enlightened; but it is to be feared is not yet enlightened enough. Hafty and undigefted tumults may take place under the idea of an equalifation of property; but it is only a calm and clear conviction of juffice, of juffice mutually to be rendered and received, of happines to be produced by the defertion of our most rooted habits, that can introduce an invariable fystem of this fort. Attempts without this preparation will be productive only of confusion. Their effect will be momentary, and a new and more barbarous inequality will fucceed. Each man with unaltered appetite will watch his opportunity to gratify his love of power or his love of diffinction, by usurping on his inattentive neighbours.

Is it to be believed then that a flate of fo great intellectual improvement can be the forerunner of barbarifm? Savages, it is true, are fubject to the weaknefs of indolence. But civilifed and refined flates are the fcene of peculiar activity. It is thought, acutenefs of difquifition, and ardour of purfuit, that fet the corporeal faculties at work. Thought begets thought. Nothing can put a flop to the progreffive advances of mind, but oppreffion. But here, fo far from being oppreffed, every man is equal, every man independent and at his eafe. It has been obferved that the eftablifhment of a republic is always attended with public enthufiafm and irrefiftible enterprife. Is it to be believed that equality,

6

TO SLOTHFULNESS.

lity, the true republicanifm, will be lefs effectual? It is true that BOOK VIII. in republics this fpirit fooner or later is found to languish. Republicanifm is not a remedy that ftrikes at the root of the evil. Injuffice, oppreffion and mifery can find an abode in those feeming happy feats. But what shall stop the progress of ardour and improvement, where the monopoly of property is unknown?

This argument will be ftrengthened, if we reflect on the The manual amount of labour that a flate of equal property will require, quired in this What is this quantity of exertion from which we are fuppoling extremely many members of the community to fhrink ? It is fo light a burthen as rather to affume the appearance of agreeable relaxation and gentle exercife, than of labour. In this community fcarcely any can be expected in confequence of their fituation or avocations to confider themfelves as exempted from manual industry. There will be no rich men to recline in indolence and fatten upon the labour of their fellows. The mathematician, the poet and the philosopher will derive a new flock of chearfulness and energy from the recurring labour that makes them feel they are There will be no perfons employed in the manufacture of men. trinkets and luxuries; and none in directing the wheels of the complicated machine of government, tax-gatherers, beadles, excifemen, tide-waiters, clerks and fecretaries. There will be neither fleets nor armies, neither courtiers nor footmen. It is the unneceffary employments that at prefent occupy the great mafs of the inhabitants of every civilifed nation, while the peafant labours inceffantly labour reftate will be fmall.

CHAP. IV.

OF THE PROPENSITY

BOOK VIII. inceffantly to maintain them in a flate more pernicious than idle-CHAP. IV. nefs.

> It has been computed that not more than one twentieth of the inhabitants of England are employed ferioufly and fubstantially in the labours of agriculture. Add to this, that the nature of agriculture is fuch, as neceffarily to give full occupation in fome parts of the year, and to leave others comparatively unemployed. We may confider thefe latter periods as equivalent to a labour which, under the direction of fufficient skill, might fuffice in a fimple flate of fociety for the fabrication of tools, for weaving, and the occupation of taylors, bakers and butchers. The object in the prefent ftate of fociety is to multiply labour, in another ftate it will be to fimplify it. A vaft difproportion of the wealth of the community has been thrown into the hands of a few, and ingenuity has been continually upon the ftretch to find out ways in which it may be expended. In the feudal times the great lord invited the poor to come and eat of the produce of his eftate upon condition of their wearing his livery, and forming themfelves in rank and file to do honour to his well born guefts. Now that exchanges are more facilitated, we have quitted this inartificial mode, and oblige the men we maintain out of our incomes to exert their ingenuity and industry in return. Thus in the inftance just mentioned, we pay the taylor to cut our clothes to pieces, that he may few them together again, and to decorate them with flitching and various ornaments, without which experience rience would fpeedily flow that they were in no refpect lefs ufeful. We are imagining in the prefent cafe a ftate of the moft rigid fimplicity.

From the fketch which has been here given it feems by no means impoffible, that the labour of every twentieth man in the community would be fufficient to maintain the reft in all the abfolute neceffaries of human life. If then this labour, instead of being performed by fo fmall a number, were amicably divided among them all, it would occupy the twentieth part of every man's time. Let us compute that the industry of a labouring man engroffes ten hours in every day, which, when we have deducted his hours of reft, recreation and meals, feems an ample It follows that half an hour a day, ferioufly emallowance. ployed in manual labour by every member of the community, would fufficiently fupply the whole with neceffaries. Who is there that would fhrink from this degree of industry? Who is there that fees the inceffant industry exerted in this city and this ifland, and would believe that, with half an hour's industry per diem, we fhould be every way happier and better than we are at prefent ? Is it poffible to contemplate this fair and generous picture of independence and virtue, where every man would have ample leifure for the nobleft energies of mind, without feeling our very fouls refreshed with admiration and hope ?

When we talk of men's finking into idlenefs if they be not Universitive excited by the ftimulus of gain, we have certainly very little con-BOOK VIII. CHAP. 1V. fidered the motives that at prefent govern the human mind. We are deceived by the apparent mercenarinefs of mankind, and imagine that the accumulation of wealth is their great object. But the cafe is far otherwife. The prefent ruling paffion of the human mind is the love of diffinction. There is no doubt a clafs in fociety that are perpetually urged by hunger and need, and have no leifure for motives lefs groß and material. But is the class next above them lefs industrious than they? I exert a certain fpecies of induftry to fupply my immediate wants; but thefe wants are foon fupplied. The reft is exerted that I may wear a better coat, that I may clothe my wife with gay attire, that I may not merely have a fhelter but a handfome habitation, not merely bread or flefh to eat, but that I may fet it out with a How many of these things would engage my fuitable decorum. attention, if I lived in a defert ifland, and had no fpectators of my economy ? If I furvey the appendages of my perfon, is there one article that is not an appeal to the refpect of my neighbours, or a refuge against their contempt? It is for this that the merchant braves the dangers of the ocean, and the mechanical inventor brings forth the treasures of his meditation. The foldier advances even to the cannon's mouth, the ftatefman expofes himfelf to the rage of an indignant people, becaufe they cannot bear to pass through life without distinction and efteem. Exclusively of certain higher motives that will prefently be mentioned, this is the purpole of all the great exertions of mankind. The man who has

OF THE PROPENSITY

824

TO SLOTHFULNESS.

has nothing to provide for but his animal wants, fcarcely ever BOOK VIII. shakes off the lethargy of his mind; but the love of praife hurries us on to the most incredible achievements. Nothing is more common than to find perfons who furpaís the reft of their fpecies in activity, inexcufably remifs in the melioration of their pecuniary affairs.

In reality those by whom this reasoning has been urged, have miltaken the nature of their own objection. They did not fincerely believe that men could be roufed into action only by the love of gain; but they imagined that in a flate of equal property men would have nothing to occupy their attention. What degree of truth there is in this idea we fhall prefently have occafion to effimate.

Meanwhile it is fufficiently obvious, that the motives which Operation of arife from the love of distinction are by no means cut off, by a under the flate of fociety incompatible with the accumulation of property. queffion: Men, no longer able to acquire the effeem or avoid the contempt of their neighbours by circumftances of drefs and furniture, will divert the paffion for diffinction into another channel. They will avoid the reproach of indolence, as carefully as they now avoid the reproach of poverty. The only perfons who at prefent neglect the effect which their appearance and manners may produce, are those whose faces are ground with famine and diftrefs. But in a flate of equal fociety no man will be oppreffed,

CHAP. IV.

OF THE PROPENSITY

CHAP. IV.

BOOK VIII. and of confequence the more delicate affections of the foul will have time to expand themfelves. The general mind having, as we have already fhown, arrived at a high pitch of improvement. the impulse that carries it out into action will be ftronger than ever. The fervour of public fpirit will be great. Leifure will be multiplied, and the leifure of a cultivated understanding is the precife period in which great defigns, defigns the tendency of which is to fecure applause and efteem, are conceived. In tranquil leifure it is impoffible for any but the fublimest mind to exift without the paffion for diffinction. This paffion, no longer permitted to lofe itfelf in indirect channels and ufelefs wanderings, will feek the nobleft courfe, and perpetually fructify the feeds of public good. Mind, though it will perhaps at no time arrive at the termination of its poffible difcoveries and improvements, will neverthelefs advance with a rapidity and firmnefs of progreffion of which we are at prefent unable to conceive the idea.

will finally be fuperfeded by a better motive.

The love of fame is no doubt a delusion. This like every other delufion will take its turn to be detected and abjured. It is an airy phantom, which will indeed afford us an imperfect pleafure fo long as we worfhip it, but will always in a confiderable degree difappoint us, and will not ftand the teft of examination. We ought to love nothing but good, a pure and immutable felicity, the good of the majority, the good of the general. If there be any thing more fubftantial than all the reft, it is juffice, juffice, a principle that refts upon this fingle postulatum, that BOOK VIII. man and man are beings of the fame nature, and fusceptible. under certain limitations, of the fame advantages. Whether the benefit proceed from you or me, fo it be but conferred, is a pitiful diffinction. Juffice has the farther advantage, which ferves us as a countercheck to prove the goodnefs of this species of arithmetic, of producing the only folid happiness to the man by whom it is practifed, as well as the good of all. But fame cannot benefit me, any more than ferve the best purposes to others. The man who acts from the love of it, may produce public good; but, if he do, it is from indirect and fourious views. Fame is an unfubftantial and delufive purfuit. If it fignify an opinion entertained of me greater than I deferve, to purfue it is vicious. If it be the precise mirror of my character, it is defirable only as a means, in as much as I may perhaps be able to do most good to the perfons who best know the extent of my capacity and the rectitude of my intentions.

TO SLOTHFULNESS.

The love of fame, when it perifhes in minds formed under the prefent fyftem, often gives place to a greater degeneracy. Selfifinefs is the habit that grows out of monopoly. When therefore this felfishness ceases to feek its gratification in public exertion. it too often narrows itfelf into fome frigid conception of perfonal pleafure, perhaps fenfual, perhaps intellectual. But this cannot be the procefs where monopoly is banifhed. Selfifhnefs has there no kindly circumftances to fofter it. Truth, the overpowering

5 N 2

CHAP. IV.

828 OF THE PROPENSITY TO SLOTHFULNESS.

BOOK VIII. CHAP. IV. is impoffible we fhould want motives, fo long as we fee clearly how multitudes and ages may be benefited by our exertions, how caufes and effects are connected in an endlefs chain, fo that no honeft effort can be loft, but will operate to good, centuries after its author is configned to the grave. This will be the general paffion, and all will be animated by the example of all.

F 820 7

CHAP. V.

OF THE OBJECTION TO THIS SYSTEM FROM THE IMPOSSIBILITY OF ITS BEING RENDERED PERMANENT.

GROUNDS OF THE OBJECTION .- ITS SERIOUS IMPORT .--ANSWER. - THE INTRODUCTION OF SUCH A SYSTEM MUST BE OWING, I. TO A DEEP SENSE OF JUSTICE - 2. TO A CLEAR INSIGHT INTO THE NATURE OF HAPPINESS -AS BEING PROPERLY INTELLECTUAL - NOT CONSIST-ING IN SENSUAL PLEASURE - OR THE PLEASURES OF DELUSION .- INFLUENCE OF THE PASSIONS CONSIDERED. -MEN WILL NOT ACCUMULATE EITHER FROM INDIVI-DUAL FORESIGHT-OR FROM VANITY.

ET us proceed to another objection. It has fometimes been BOOK VIII. faid by those who oppose the doctrine here maintained, "that equality might perhaps contribute to the improvement the objection. and happiness of mankind, if it were confistent with the nature of man that fuch a principle fhould be rendered permanent; but that every expectation of that kind must prove abortive. Confusion would be introduced under the idea of equality to-day, but the old vices and monopolies would return to-morrow. All that the rich would have purchased by the most generous facrifice,

OF THE PERMANENCE OF THE BOOK VIII. CHAP. V.

830

fice, would be a period of barbarifm, from which the ideas and regulations of civil fociety muft commence as from a new infancy. The nature of man cannot be changed. There would at leaft be fome vicious and defigning members of fociety, who would endeavour to fecure to themfelves indulgencies beyond the reft. Mind would not be reduced to that exact uniformity which a ftate of equal property demands; and the variety of fentiments which muft always in fome degree prevail, would inevitably fubvert the refined fyftems of fpeculative perfection."

Its ferious import.

No objection can be more effential than that which is here It highly becomes us in fo momentous a fubject to adduced. refift all extravagant fpeculations : it would be truly to be lamented, if, while we parted with that ftate of fociety through which mind has been thus far advanced, we were replunged into barbarifm by the purfuit of specious appearances. But what is worft of all, is that, if this objection be true, it is to be feared there is no remedy. Mind must go forward. What it fees and admires, it will fome time or other feek to attain. Such is the inevitable law of our nature. But it is impoffible not to fee the beauty of equality, and to be charmed with the benefits it feems to promife. The confequence is fure. Man, according to the fystem of these reasoners, is prompted to advance for some time with fuccefs; but after that time, in the very act of purfuing farther improvement, he neceffarily plunges beyond the compass of his powers, and has then his petty career to begin afresh.

GENUINE SYSTEM OF PROPERTY.

The objection reprefents him as a foul abortion, with juft under- BOOK VIII. ftanding enough to fee what is good, but with too little to retain him in the practice of it.-Let us confider whether equality, - once established, would be fo precarious as it is here represented.

In anfwer to this objection it must first be remembered, Answer, that the flate of equalifation we are here fuppoling is not the refult of accident, of the authority of a chief magiftrate, or the over earneft perfuafion of a few enlightened thinkers, but is produced by the ferious and deliberate conviction of the community at large. We will suppose for the prefent that it is poffible for fuch a conviction to take place among a given number of perfons living in fociety with each other: and, if it be poffible in a fmall community, there feems to be no fufficient reafon to prove that it is impoffible in one of larger and larger dimensions. The queftion we have here to examine is concerning the probability, when the conviction has once been introduced, of its becoming permanent.

The conviction refts upon two intellectual impreffions, one The introof justice, and the other of happines. Equalifation of property cannot begin to affume a fixed appearance in human fociety, till the fentiment becomes deeply wrought into the mind, that the genuine wants of any man conflitute his only just claim to the appropriating any fpecies of commodity. If the general fenfe of mankind duction of fuch a fystem must be owing, 1. to a deep fenfe of juffice.

CHAP. V.

OF THE PERMANENCE OF THE

BOOK VIII. CHAP. V.

mankind were once fo far enlightened, as to produce a perpetual impreffion of this truth, of fo forcible a fort as to be exempt from all objections and doubt, we fhould look with equal horror and contempt at the idea of any man's accumulating a property he did not want. All the evils that a flate of monopoly never fails to engender would ftand forward in our minds. together with all the exifting happiness that attended upon a ftate of freedom. We should feel as much alienation of thought from the confuming ufelefsly upon ourfelves what would be beneficial to another, or from the accumulating property for the purpose of obtaining some kind of ascendancy over the mind of our neighbours, as we now feel from the commission of murder. No man will difpute, that a flate of equal property once eftablifhed, would greatly diminish the evil propensities of man. But the crime we are now fuppoling is more atrocious than any that is to be found in the prefent flate of fociety. Man perhaps is incapable under any circumstance of perpetrating an action of which he has a clear and undoubted perception that it is contrary to the general good. But be this as it will, it is hardly to be believed that any man for the fake of fome imaginary gratification to himfelf would wantonly injure the whole, if his mind were not first ulcerated with the impression of the injury that fociety by its ordinances is committing against him. The cafe we are here confidering is that of a man, who does not even imagine himfelf injured, and yet wilfully fubverts a ftate of happinefs to which

GENUINE SYSTEM OF PROPERTY.

which no description can do justice, to make room for the BOOK VIII. CHAP. V. return of all those calamities and vices with which mankind have been infeited from the earlieft page of hiftory.

The equalifation we are defcribing is farther indebted for its z to a clear infight into empire in the mind to the ideas with which it is attended of per- the nature of fonal happines. It grows out of a fimple, clear and unanswerable theory of the human mind, that we first stand in need of a certain animal fubfiftence and fhelter, and after that, that our only true as being profelicity confifts in the expansion of our intellectual powers, the knowledge of truth, and the practice of virtue. It might feem at first fight as if this theory omitted a part of the experimental hiftory of mind, the pleafures of fenfe and the pleafures of delu-But this omiffion is apparent, not real. However many not confifting fion. are the kinds of pleafure of which we are fufceptible, the truly pleafure: prudent man will facrifice the inferior to the more exquifite. Now no man who has ever produced or contemplated the happinefs of others with a liberal mind, will deny that this exercife is infinitely the most pleafurable of all fensations. But he that is guilty of the fmalleft excess of fenfual pleafures, by fo much diminishes his capacity of obtaining this highest pleasure. Not to add, if that be of any importance, that rigid temperance is the reafonable means of tafting fenfual pleafures with the higheft relifh. This was the fyftem of Epicurus, and must be the fyftem of every man who ever fpeculated deeply on the nature of human happinels. For the pleafures of delufion, they are abfolutely or the pleahappinefs :

perly intellectual :

fures of deluincompatible fion.

OF THE PERMANENCE OF THE BOOK VIII. CHAP. V.

834

incompatible with our higheft pleafure. If we would either promote or enjoy the happiness of others, we must feek to know in what it confifts. But knowledge is the irreconcileable foe of In proportion as mind rifes to its true element, and delution. shakes off those prejudices which are the authors of our misery, it becomes incapable of deriving pleafure from flattery, fame or power, or indeed from any fource that is not compatible with, or in other words does not make a part of the common good. The most palpable of all classes of knowledge is that I am, perfonally confidered, but an atom in the ocean of mind .- The first rudiment therefore of that science of personal happiness which is infeparable from a flate of equalifation, is, that I fhall derive infinitely more pleafure from fimplicity, frugality and truth, than from luxury, empire and fame. What temptation has a man, entertaining this opinion, and living in a flate of equal property. to accumulate ?

Influence of the paffions confidered. This queftion has been perpetually darkened by the doctrine, fo familiar to writers of morality, of the independent operations of reafon and paffion. Such diffinctions muft always darken. Of how many parts does mind confift? Of none. It confifts merely of a feries of thought fucceeding thought from the first moment of our existence to its termination *. This word passion, which has produced fuch extensive mischief in the philosophy of mind, and has no real archetype, is perpetually shifting its meaning. Sometimes

* Book IV, Chap. VII, p. 335.

б

GENUINE SYSTEM OF PROPERTY.

times it is applied univerfally to all those thoughts, which, being BOOK VIII. peculiarly vivid, and attended with great force of argument real or imaginary, carry us out into action with uncommon energy. Thus we fpeak of the paffion of benevolence, public fpirit or courage. Sometimes it fignifies those vivid thoughts only, which upon accurate examination appear to be founded in error. In the firft fense the word might have been unexceptionable. Vehement defire is the refult of a certain operation of the understanding, and must always be in a joint ratio of the supposed clearness of the proposition and importance of the practical effects. In the fecond fenfe, the doctrine of the paffions would have been exceedingly harmlefs, if we had been accuftomed to put the definition inftead of the thing defined. It would then have been found that it merely affirmed that the human mind muft always be liable to precifely the fame mistakes as we observe in it at present, or in other words affirmed the neceffary permanence in opposition to the neceffary perfectibility of intellect. Who is there indeed that fees not, in the cafe above flated, the abfurdity of fuppofing a man, fo long as he has a clear view of juffice and intereft lying on one fide of a given queftion, to be fubject to errors that irrefiftibly compel him to the other? The mind is no doubt liable to fluctuation. But there is a degree of conviction that would render it impoffible for us any longer to derive pleafure from intemperance, dominion or fame, and this degree in the inceffant progrefs of thought muft one day arrive.

CHAP. V.

OF THE PERMANENCE OF THE BOOK VIII. CHAP. V.

Men will not accumulate either from individual forefight :

This proposition of the permanence of a system of equal property, after it has once been brought into action by the energies of reafon and conviction, will be placed out of the reach of all equitable doubt, if we proceed to form to ourfelves an accurate picture of the action of this fystem. Let us suppose that we are introduced to a community of men, who are accustomed to an induftry proportioned to the wants of the whole, and to communicate inftantly and unconditionally, each man to his neighbour, that for which the former has not and the latter has immediate occasion. Here the first and simplest motive to personal accumulation is inftantly cut off. I need not accumulate to protect myfelf against accidents, fickness or infirmity, for these are claims the validity of which is not regarded as a fubject of doubt, and with which every man is accustomed to comply. I can accumulate in a confiderable degree nothing but what is perifhable, for exchange being unknown, that which I cannot perfonally confume adds nothing to the fum of my wealth .- Meanwhile it fhould be obferved, that, though accumulation for private purpofes under fuch a fyftem would be in the higheft degree irrational and abfurd, this by no means precludes fuch accumulation. as may be neceffary to provide against public contingencies. If there be any truth in the preceding reafonings, this kind of accumulation will be unattended with danger. Add to this, that the perpetual tendency of wifdom is to preclude contingency. It is well known that dearths are principally owing to the falfe precautions cautions and falfe timidity of mankind; and it is reafonable to BOOK VIIT. fuppofe that a degree of fkill will hereafter be produced, which will gradually annihilate the failure of crops and other fimilar accidents.

GENUINE SYSTEM OF PROPERTY.

It has already appeared, that the principal and unintermitting or vanity. motive to private accumulation, is the love of diffinction and efteem. This motive is alfo withdrawn. As accumulation can have no rational object, it would be viewed as a mark of infanity, not a title to admiration. Men would be accuftomed to the fimple principles of juffice, and know that nothing was entitled to effeem but talents and virtue. Habituated to employ their fuperfluity to fupply the wants of their neighbour, and to dedicate the time which was not neceffary for manual labour to the cultivation of intellect, with what fentiments would they behold the man, who was foolifh enough to few a bit of lace upon his coat, or affix any other ornament to his perfon? In fuch a community property would perpetually tend to find its level. It would be interefting to all to be informed of the perfon in whofe hands a certain quantity of any commodity was lodged, and every man would apply with confidence to him for the fupply of his wants in that commodity. Putting therefore out of the queftion every kind of compulsion, the feeling of depravity and abfurdity, that would be excited with relation to the man who refused to part with that for which he had no real need, would operate in all cafes as a fufficient difcouragement to fo odious an innovation

837

CHAP. V.

OF THE PERMANENCE, &c.

innovation. Every man would conceive that he had a just and BOOK VIII. CHAP. V. complete title to make use of my superfluity. If I refused to liften to reafon and expoftulation on this head, he would not flay to adjust with me a thing fo vicious as exchange, but would leave me in order to feek the fupply from fome rational being. Accumulation, inftead, as now, of calling forth every mark of refpect, would tend to cut off the individual who attempted it from all the bonds of fociety, and fink him in neglect and oblivion. The influence of accumulation at prefent is derived from the idea of eventual benefit in the mind of the observer : but the accumulator then would be in a cafe ftill worfe than that of the mifer now, who, while he adds thousands to his heap, cannot be prevailed upon to part with a fuperfluous farthing, and is therefore the object of general defertion.

[ 839 ]

CHAP. VI.

OF THE OBJECTION TO THIS SYSTEM FROM THE INFLEXIBILITY OF ITS RESTRICTIONS.

NATURE OF THE OBJECTION .- NATURAL AND MORAL IN-DEPENDENCE DISTINGUISHED-THE FIRST BENEFICIAL -THE SECOND INJURIOUS. - TENDENCY OF RESTRIC-TION PROPERLY SO CALLED .- THE GENUINE SYSTEM OF PROPERTY NOT A SYSTEM OF RESTRICTIONS-DOES NOT REQUIRE COMMON LABOUR, MEALS OR MAGAZINES .---SUCH RESTRICTIONS ABSURD - AND UNNECESSARY .---EVILS OF COOPERATION .--- ITS PROVINCE MAY PERPETU-ALLY BE DIMINISHED .- MANUAL LABOUR MAY BE EX-TINGUISHED .- CONSEQUENT ACTIVITY OF INTELLECT. --- IDEAS OF THE FUTURE STATE OF COOPERATION .---ITS LIMITS .- ITS LEGITIMATE PROVINCE. - EVILS OF COHABITATION-AND MARRIAGE,-THEY OPPOSE THE DEVELOPMENT OF OUR FACULTIES --- ARE INIMICAL TO OUR HAPPINESS - AND DEPRAVE OUR UNDERSTAND-INGS .- MARRIAGE A BRANCH OF THE PREVAILING SYS-TEM OF PROPERTY .- CONSEQUENCES OF ITS ABOLITION. --EDUCATION NEED NOT IN THAT STATE OF SOCIETY BE A SUBJECT OF POSITIVE INSTITUTION. ---- THESE PRINCIPLES

OF THE ENJOYMENT

PRINCIPLES DO NOT LEAD TO A SULLEN INDIVIDUA-LITY. — PARTIAL ATTACHMENTS CONSIDERED. — BENE-FITS ACCRUING FROM A JUST AFFECTION — MATERI-ALLY PROMOTED BY THESE PRINCIPLES. — THE GENU-INE SYSTEM OF PROPERTY DOES NOT PROHIBIT ACCU-MULATION — IMPLIES A CERTAIN DEGREE OF APPRO-PRIATION — AND DIVISION OF LABOUR.

BOOK VIII. CHAP. VI. Nature of the objection. N objection that has often been urged againft a fyftem of equal property, is, " that it is inconfiftent with perfonal independence. Every man according to this fcheme is a paffive inftrument in the hands of the community. He muft eat and drink, and play and fleep at the bidding of others. He has no habitation, no period at which he can retreat into himfelf, and not afk another's leave. He has nothing that he can call his own, not even his time or his perfon. Under the appearance of a perfect freedom from oppreffion and tyranny, he is in reality fubjected to the moft unlimited flavery."

Natural and moral independence diftinguifhed : the firft beneficial :

the fecond injuricus. To underftand the force of this objection it is neceffary that we fhould diffinguifh two forts of independence, one of which may be denominated natural, and the other moral. Natural independence, a freedom from all conftraint except that of reafon and argument prefented to the underftanding, is of the utmoft importance to the welfare and improvement of mind. Moral independence on the contrary is always injurious. The dependence which is

LIBERTY. OF

is effential in this refpect to the wholfome temperament of fo- BOOK VIII. ciety, includes in it articles that are no doubt unpalatable to a multitude of the prefent race of mankind, but that owe their unpopularity only to weakness and vice. It includes a centure to be exercifed by every individual over the actions of another. a promptnefs to enquire into them, and to judge them. Why fhould I fhrink from this? What could be more beneficial than for each man to derive every poffible affiftance for correcting and moulding his conduct from the perfpicacity of his neighbours? The reafon why this fpecies of cenfure is at prefent exercifed with illiberality, is becaufe it is exercifed clandeftinely and we fubmit to its operation with impatience and averfion. Moral independence is always injurious: for, as has abundantly appeared in the course of the present enquiry, there is no fituation in which I can be placed, where it is not incumbent upon me to adopt a certain fpecies of conduct in preference to all others, and of confequence where I shall not prove an ill member of fociety, if I act in any other than a particular manner. The attachment that is felt by the prefent race of mankind to independence in this respect, the defire to act as they pleafe without being accountable to the principles of reafon, is highly detrimental to the general welfare.

But, if we ought never to act independently of the principles Tendency of reffriction, of reason, and in no inftance to thrink from the candid examina- properly for called. tion of another, it is neverthelefs effential that we should at all times be free to cultivate the individuality and follow the dictates of our own judgment. If there be any thing in the fcheme of equal property that infringes this principle, the objection is conclusive. If the fcheme be, as it has often been reprefented, a fcheme of goveran ent, conftraint and regulation, it is no doubt in direct hofility with the principles of this work.

CHAP. VI.

OF THE ENJOYMENT

BOOK VIII.

The genuine fyftem of property not a fyftem of reftrictions : does not require common labour, meals or magazines. But the truth is, that a fyftem of equal property requires no reftrictions or fuperintendence whatever. There is no need of common labour, common meals or common magazines. Thefe are feeble and miftaken inftruments for reftraining the conduct without making conqueft of the judgment. If you cannot bring over the hearts of the community to your party, expect no fuccefs from brute regulations. If you can, regulation is unneceffary. Such a fyftem was well enough adapted to the military conflictution of Sparta; but it is wholly unworthy of men who are enlifted in no caufe but that of reafon and juffice. Beware of reducing men to the ftate of machines. Govern them through no medium but that of inclination and conviction.

Such-reftrictions abfurd : Why fhould we have common meals? Am I obliged to be hungry at the fame time that you are? Ought -I to come at a certain hour, from the mufeum where I am working, the recefs where I meditate, or the obfervatory where I remark the phenomena of nature, to a certain hall appropriated to the office of eating; inftead of eating, as reafon bids me, at the time and place moft fuited to my avocations? Why have common magazines?

For

LIBERTY OF

For the purpose of carrying our provisions a certain diffance, that BOOK VIII. we may afterwards bring them back again? Or is this precaution really neceffary, after all that has been faid in praife of equal fary. fociety and the omnipotence of reafon, to guard us against the knavery and covetoulnels of our affociates ? If it be, for God's fake let us difcard the parade of political juffice, and go over to the ftandard of those reasoners who fay, that man and the practice of justice are incompatible with each other.

Once more let us be upon our guard against reducing men to Evils of cothe condition of brute machines. The objectors of the laft chapter were partly in the right when they fpoke of the endless variety of mind. It would be abfurd to fay that we are not capable of truth, of evidence and agreement. In these respects, so far as mind is in a ftate of progreffive improvement, we are perpetually coming nearer to each other. But there are fubjects about which we shall continually differ, and ought to differ. The ideas, the affociations and the circumftances of each man are properly his own; and it is a pernicious fyftem that would lead us to require all men, however different their circumstances, to act in many of the common affairs of life by a precife general rule. Add to this, that, by the doctrine of progreffive improvement, we fhall always be erroneous, though we shall every day become lefs erroneous. The proper method for haftening the decay of error, is not, by brute force, or by regulation which is one of the classes of force, and unnecef-operation.

5 P 2

CHAP. VI.

ŧΟ

OF THE ENJOYMENT

BOOK VIII. to endeavour to reduce men to intellectual uniformity; but on CHAP. VI. the contrary by teaching every man to think for himfelf.

> From thefe principles it appears that every thing that is ufually underftood by the term cooperation, is in fome degree an evil. A man in folitude, is obliged to facrifice or poftpone the execution of his beft thoughts to his own convenience. How many admirable defigns have perifhed in the conception by means of this circumftance? The true remedy is for men to reduce their wants to the feweft poffible, and as much as poffible to fimplify the mode of fupplying them. It is ftill worfe when a man is alfo obliged to confult the convenience of others. If I be expected to eat or to work in conjunction with my neighbour, it muft either be at a time moft convenient to me, or to him, or to neither of us. We cannot be reduced to a clock-work uniformity.

Its province may perpetually be diminified.

LIBERTY. OF

cut a canal, to navigate a veffel, requires the labour of many. BOOK VIII Will it always require the labour of many? When we look at the complicated machines of human contrivance, various forts of mills, of weaving engines, of fteam engines, are we not aftonifhed at the compendium of labour they produce? Who fhall fay where this species of improvement must stop? At prefent such inventions alarm the labouring part of the community; and they may be productive of temporary diffrefs, though they conduce in the fequel to the most important interests of the multitude. But in a ftate of equal labour their utility will be liable to no difpute. Hereafter it is by no means clear that the most extensive operations will not be within the reach of one man; or, to make ufe of a familiar inftance, that a plough may not be turned into a field, and perform its office without the need of fuperintendence. It was in this fenfe that the celebrated Franklin conjectured, that " mind would one day become omnipotent over matter."

The conclusion of the progress which has here been sketched, Manuallais fomething like a final clofe to the neceffity of manual labour. is highly inftructive in fuch cafes to obferve how the fublime geniuses of former times anticipated what seems likely to be the future improvement of mankind. It was one of the laws of Lycurgus, that no Spartan fhould be employed in manual labour. For this purpofe under his fyftem it was neceffary that they fhould be plentifully fupplied with flaves devoted to drudgery. Matter, cr.,

It extinguished,

845

CHAP. VI.

4

to .

OF THE ENJOYMENT

BOOK VIII. CHAP. VI. to fpeak more accurately, the certain and unintermitting laws of the univerfe, will be the Helots of the period we are contemplating. We fhall end in this refpect, oh immortal legiflator ! at the point from which you began.

Confequent activity of intellect. To thefe profpects perhaps the objection will once again be repeated, "that men, delivered from the neceffity of manual labour, will fink into fupinenefs." What narrow views of the nature and capacities of mind do fuch objections imply? The only thing neceffary to put intellect into action is motive. Are there no motives equally cogent with the profpect of hunger? Whofe thoughts are most active, most rapid and unwearied, those of Newton or the ploughman? When the mind is flored with profpects of intellectual greatnefs and utility, can it fink into torpor?

Ideas of the future state of cooperation. Its limits. To return to the fubject of cooperation. It may be a curious fpeculation to attend to the progreffive fteps by which this feature of human fociety may be expected to decline. For example: fhall we have concerts of mufic? The miferable flate of mechanifm of the majority of the performers is fo confpicuous, as to be even at this day a topic of mortification and ridicule. Will it not be practicable hereafter for one man to perform the whole? Shall we have theatrical exhibitions? This feems to include an abfurd and vicious cooperation. It may be doubted whether men will hereafter come forward in any mode gravely to repeat words and ideas not their own? It may be doubted whether any mufical performer performer will habitually execute the compositions of others? We BOOK VIII. yield fupinely to the fuperior merit of our predeceffors, becaufe we are accuftomed to indulge the inactivity of our own faculties. All formal repetition of other men's ideas feems to be a fcheme for imprifoning for fo long a time the operations of our own mind. It borders perhaps in this refpect upon a breach of fincerity, which requires that we fhould give immediate utterance to every ufeful and valuable idea that occurs to our thoughts.

LIBERTY. OF

Having ventured to flate thefe hints and conjectures, let us Its legitimate endeavour to mark the limits of individuality. Every man that receives an impression from any external object, has the current of his own thoughts modified by force; and yet without external impreffions we fhould be nothing. We ought not, except under certain limitations, to endeavour to free ourfelves from their approach. Every man that reads the compolition of another, fuffers the fucceffion of his ideas to be in a confiderable degree under the direction of his author. But it does not feem as if this would ever form a fufficient objection against reading. One man will always have flored up reflections and facts that another wants; and mature and digefted difcourfe will perhaps always, in equal circumflances, be fuperior to that which is extempore. Conversation is a fpecies of cooperation, one or the other party always yielding to have his ideas guided by the other: and yet converfation and the intercourfe of mind with mind feem to be the moft fertile fources. of improvement. It is here as it is with punifhment. He that province.

,

OF THE ENJOYMENT

BOOK VIII. in the gentleft manner undertakes to reafon another out of his CHAP. VI. vices, will probably occafion pain; but this fpecies of punifhment ought upon no account to be fuperfeded.

Evils of cohabitation :

Another article which belongs to the fubject of cooperation is cohabitation. A very fimple process will lead us to a right decifion in this inftance. Science is most effectually cultivated, when the greatest number of minds are employed in the purfuit of it. If an hundred men fpontaneoufly engage the whole energy of their faculties upon the folution of a given queftion, the chance of fuccefs will be greater, than if only ten men were fo employed. By the fame reafon the chance will be alfo increafed, in proportion as the intellectual operations of these men are individual. in proportion as their conclusions are directed by the reason of the thing, uninfluenced by the force either of compulsion or fympa-All attachments to individuals, except in proportion to thy. their merits, are plainly unjuft. It is therefore defirable, that we fhould be the friends of man rather than of particular men, and that we fhould purfue the chain of our own reflexions, with no other interruption than information or philanthropy requires.

and-marriage.

They oppofe the development of our faculties :

This fubject of cohabitation is particularly intereffing, as it includes in it the fubject of marriage. It will therefore be proper to extend our enquiries fomewhat further upon this head. Cohabitation is not only an evil as it checks the independent progrefs of mind; it is also inconfistent with the imperfections and propenfities

It is abfurd to expect that the inclinations and penfities of man. wifhes of two human beings fhould coincide through any long period of time. To oblige them to act and to live together, is to fubject them to fome inevitable portion of thwarting, bickering and unhappinefs. This cannot be otherwife, fo long as man has failed to reach the flandard of abfolute perfection. The fuppofition that I must have a companion for life, is the refult of a complication of vices. It is the dictate of cowardice, and not of fortitude. It flows from the defire of being loved and effeemed for fomething that is not defert.

But the evil of marriage as it is practifed in European coun- and deprave tries lies deeper than this. The habit is, for a thoughtlefs and flandings. romantic youth of each fex to come together, to fee each other for a few times and under circumftances full of delufion, and then to yow to each other eternal attachment. What is the confequence of this? In almost every instance they find themselves deceived. They are reduced to make the beft of an irretrievable They are prefented with the ftrongeft imaginable tempmiftake. tation to become the dupes of falfhood. They are led to conceive it their wifeft policy to fhut their eyes upon realities, happy if by any perversion of intellect they can perfuade themfelves that they were right in their first crude opinion of their compa-The inflitution of marriage is a fyftem of fraud; and nion. men who carefully millead their judgments in the daily affair of their life, muft always have a crippled judgment in every other

BOOK VIII. CHAP. VI. are inimical to our happinefs :

849

our under-

OF THE ENJOYMENT

BOOK VIII. CHAP. VI.

850

concern. We ought to difmifs our miftake as foon as it is detected; but we are taught to cherifh it. We ought to be inceffant in our fearch after virtue and worth; but we are taught to check our enquiry, and fhut our eyes upon the moft attractive and admirable objects. Marriage is law, and the worft of all laws. Whatever our underftandings may tell us of the perfon from whofe connexion we fhould derive the greateft improvement, of the worth of one woman and the demerits of another, we are obliged to confider what is law, and not what is juffice.

Marriage a branch of the prevailing fystem of property. Add to this, that marriage is an affair of property, and the worft of all properties. So long as two human beings are forbidden by politive inftitution to follow the dictates of their own mind, prejudice is alive and vigorous. So long as I feek to engrofs one woman to myfelf, and to prohibit my neighbour from proving his fuperior defert and reaping the fruits of it, I am guilty of the moft odious of all monopolies. Over this imaginary prize men watch with perpetual jealoufy, and one man will find his defires and his capacity to circumvent as much excited, as the other is excited to traverfe his projects and fruftrate his hopes. As long as this ftate of fociety continues, philanthropy will be croffed and checked in a thoufand ways, and the ftill augmenting ftream of abufe will continue to flow.

Confequences of its abolition. The abolition of marriage will be attended with no evils. We are apt to reprefent it to ourfelves as the harbinger of brutal luft and depravity. But it really happens in this as in other BOOK VIII. cafes, that the politive laws which are made to reftrain our vices, irritate and multiply them. Not to fay, that the fame fentiments of juffice and happiness which in a state of equal property would deftroy the relifh for luxury, would decreafe our inordinate appetites of every kind, and lead us univerfally to prefer the pleasures of intellect to the pleasures of fense.

luft

The intercourse of the fexes will in fuch a flate fall under the fame fystem as any other species of friendship. Exclusively of all groundlefs and obstinate attachments, it will be impossible for me to live in the world without finding one man of a worth fuperior to that of any other whom I have an opportunity of observing. To this man I shall feel a kindness in exact proportion to my apprehenfion of his worth. The cafe will be precifely the fame with refpect to the female fex. I shall affiduously cultivate the intercourfe of that woman whofe accomplishments shall strike me in the most powerful manner. " But it may happen that other men will feel for her the fame preference that I do." This will create no difficulty. We may all enjoy her conversation; and we fhall all be wife enough to confider the fenfual intercourfe as a very trivial object.- This, like every other affair in which two perfons are concerned, must be regulated in each fucceffive inftance by the unforced confent of either party. It is a mark of the extreme depravity of our prefent habits, that we are inclined to fuppofe the fenfual intercourfe any wife material to the advantages arifing from the pureft affection. Reafonable men now

5Q 2

CHAP. VI.

851 eat

OF THE ENJOYMENT

BOOK VIII. eat and drink, not from the love of pleafure, but becaufe eating CHAP. VI. and drinking are effential to our healthful exiftence. Reafonable men then will propagate their fpecies, not becaufe a certain fenfible pleafure is annexed to this action, but becaufe it is right the fpecies fhould be propagated ; and the manner in which they exercife this function will be regulated by the dictates of reafon and duty.

> Such are fome of the confiderations that will probably regulate the commerce of the fexes. It cannot be definitively affirmed whether it be known in fuch a flate of fociety who is the father of each individual child. But it may be affirmed that fuch knowledge will be of no importance. It is ariftocracy, felf love and family pride that teach us to fet a value upon it at prefent. I ought to prefer no human being to another, becaufe that being is my father, my wife or my fon, but becaufe, for reafons which equally appeal to all underftandings, that being is entitled to preference. One among the meafures which will fucceffively be dictated by the fpirit of democracy, and that probably at no great diffance, is the abolition of furnames.

Education need not in that flate of fociety be a fubject of politive inflieution. Let us confider the way in which this flate of fociety will modify education. It may be imagined that the abolition of marriage would make it in a certain fenfe the affair of the public; though, if there be any truth in the reafonings of this work, to provide for it by the politive inflitutions of a community, would be extremely inconfiftent with the true principles of the 4.

OF LIBERTY.

intellectual fyftem *. Education may be regarded as confifting BOOK VIII. of various branches. First, the perfonal cares which the helpless state of an infant requires. These will probably devolve upon the mother; unlefs, by frequent parturition or by the very nature of these cares, that were found to render her share of the burthen unequal; and then it would be amicably and willingly participated by others. Secondly, food and other neceffary fupplies. Thefe, as we have already feen, would cafily find' their true level, and fpontaneoully flow from the quarter in which they abounded to the quarter that was deficient †. Laftly, the term education may be used to fignify instruction. The task of: inftruction, under fuch a form of fociety as that we are contemplating, will be greatly fimplified and altered from what it is at prefent. It will then be thought no more legitimate to make boys flaves, than to make men fo. The bufinefs will not then be to bring forward fo many adepts in the egg-fhell, that the vanity of parents may be flattered by hearing their praifes. No man: will then think of vexing with premature learning the feeble and inexperienced, för fear that, when they came to years of difcre-tion, they fhould refuse to be learned. Mind will be fuffered to : expand itfelf in proportion as occasion and impression shall excite it, and not tortured and enervated by being caft in a particular. mould. No creature in human form will be expected to learny any thing, but becaufe he defires it and has fome conception of * Book VI, Chap. VIII. + Chap. V, p. 837.

×4.

OF THE ENJOYMENT

BOOK VIII. CHAP. VI. its utility and value; and every man, in proportion to his capacity, will be ready to furnish fuch general hints and comprehenfive views, as will fuffice for the guidance and encouragement of him who fludies from a principle of defire.

Thefe principles do not lead to a fullen individuality. Before we quit this part of the fubject it will be neceffary to obviate an objection that will fuggeft itfelf to fome readers. They will fay "that man was formed for fociety and reciprocal kindnefs; and therefore is by his nature little adapted to the fyftem of individuality which is here delineated. The true perfection of man is to blend and unite his own exiftence with that of another, and therefore a fyftem which forbids him all partialities and attachments, tends to degeneracy and not to improvement."

No doubt man is formed for fociety. But there is a way in which for a man to lofe his own exiftence in that of others, that is eminently vicious and detrimental. Every man ought to reft upon his own centre, and confult his own underftanding. Every man ought to feel his independence, that he can affert the principles of juffice and truth, without being obliged treacheroufly to adapt them to the peculiarities of his fituation, and the errors of others.

Partial attachments confidered. No doubt man is formed for fociety. But he is formed for, or in other words his faculties enable him to ferve, the whole and and not a part. Juffice obliges us to fympathife with a man of BOOK VIII. merit more fully than with an infignificant and corrupt member of fociety. But all partialities ftrictly fo called, tend to the injury of him who feels them, of mankind in general, and even of him who is their object. The fpirit of partiality is well exprefled in the memorable faying of Themistocles, "God forbid that I should fit upon a bench of justice, where my friends found no more favour than ftrangers!" In fact, as has been repeatedly feen in the courfe of this work, we fit in every action of our lives upon a bench of juffice; and play in humble imitation the part of the unjust judge, whenever we indulge the fmalleft atom of partiality.

OF LIBERTY.

Such are the limitations of the focial principle. These limitations in reality tend to improve it and render its operations beneficial. It would be a miferable miftake to fuppofe that the principle is not of the utmost importance to mankind. All that in which the human mind differs from the intellectual principle in animals is the growth of fociety. All that is excellent in man is the fruit of progreffive improvement, of the circumstance of one age taking advantage of the difcoveries of a preceding age, and fetting out from the point at which they had arrived.

Without fociety we fhould be wretchedly deficient in motives materially to improvement. But what is most of all, without fociety our improvements would be nearly ufelefs. Mind without bene-promoted by thefe principles.

volence

CHAP. VI.

Benefits accruing from a juft affection :

OF THE ENJOYMENT

CHAP. VI. ____

BOOK VIII. volence is a barren and a cold exiftence. It is in feeking the good of others, in embracing a great and expansive fphere of action, in forgetting our own individual interefts, that we find our true element. The tendency of the whole fystem delineated in this Book is to lead us to that element. The individuality it recommends tends to the good of the whole, and is valuable only as a means to that end. Can that be termed a felfifh fyftem, where no man defires luxury, no man dares to be guilty of injuffice, and every one devotes himfelf to supply the wants, animal or intellectual, of others ?--- To proceed.

The genuine fyftem of property does not prohibit accumulation:

As a genuine flate of fociety is incompatible with all laws and reftrictions, fo it cannot have even this reftriction, that no man shall amass property. The fecurity against accumulation, as has already been faid, lies in the perceived abfurdity and inutility of accumulation. The practice, if it can be conceived in a flate of fociety where the principles of juffice were adequately under-· flood, would not even be dangerous. The idea would not create alarm, as it is apt to do in profpect among the prefent advocates of political juffice. Men would feel nothing but their laughter or their pity excited at fo ftrange a perverfity of human intellect.

implies a certain degree of appropriation.

What would denominate any thing my property ? The fact, that it was neceffary to my welfare. My right would be coeval with the existence of that necessity. The word property would probably probably remain; its fignification only would be modified. The miftake does not fo properly lie in the idea itfelf, as in the fource from which it is traced. What I have, if it be neceffary for my ufe, is truly mine; what I have, though the fruit of my own industry, if unneceffary, it is an ufurpation for me to retain.

Force in fuch a flate of fociety would be unknown; I fhould part with nothing without a full confent. Caprice would be unknown; no man would covet that which I used, unless he diftinctly apprehended, that it would be more beneficial in his poffeffion than it was in mine. My apartment would be as facred to a certain extent, as it is at prefent. No man would obtrude himfelf upon me to interrupt the course of my ftudies and meditations. No man would feel the whim of occupying my apartment, while he could provide himfelf another as good of his own. That which was my apartment yesterday would probably be my apartment to-day. We have few purfuits that do not require a certain degree of apparatus; and it would be for the general good that I fhould find in ordinary cafes the apparatus ready for my use to-day that I left yesterday. But, though the idea of property thus modified would remain, the jealoufy and felfifhness of property would be gone. Bolts and locks would be unknown. Every man would be welcome to make every use of my accommodations, that did not interfere with my own use of them. Novices as we are, we may figure

BOOK VIII. CHAP. VI

to

OF THE ENJOYMENT

BCOK VIII. CHAP. VI. to ourfelves a thousand disputes, where property was held by fo flight a tenure. But disputes would in reality be impossible." They are the offspring of a mishapen and disproportioned love of ourfelves. Do you want my table? Make one for yourfelf; or, if I be more skilful in that respect than you, I will make one for you. Do you want it immediately? Let us compare the urgency of your wants and mine, and let justice decide.

and division of labour.

These observations lead us to the confideration of one additional difficulty, which relates to the division of labour. Shall each man make all his tools, his furniture and accommodations? This would perhaps be a tedious operation. Every man performs the task to which he is accustomed more skilfully and in a fhorter time than another. It is reafonable that you fhould make for me, that which perhaps I should be three or four times as long making, and fhould make imperfectly at laft. Shall we then introduce barter and exchange? By no means. The abftract fpirit of exchange will perhaps govern; every man will employ an equal portion of his time in manual labour. But the individual application of exchange is of all practices the most pernicious. The moment I require any other reafon for fupplying you than the cogency of your claim, the moment, in addition to the dictates of benevolence, I demand a prospect of advantage to myfelf, there is an end of that political juffice and pure fociety of which we treat. No man will have a trade. It cannot be fuppofed that a man will conftruct any fpecies of commodity, but in proportion proportion as it is wanted. The profeffion paramount to all BOOK VIII. others and in which every man will bear his part, will be that of CHAP. VI. inan, and in addition perhaps that of cultivator.

The division of labour, as it has been treated by commercial writers, is for the most part the offspring of avarice. It has been found that ten perfons can make two hundred and forty times as many pins in a day as one perfon *. This refinement is the growth of luxury. The object is to fee into how vaft a furface the industry of the lower classes may be beaten, the more completely to gild over the indolent and the proud. The ingenuity of the merchant is whetted, by new improvements of this fort to transport more of the wealth of the powerful into his own coffers. The poffibility of effecting a compendium of labour by this means will be greatly diminished, when men shall learn to deny themfelves fuperfluities. The utility of fuch a faving of labour, where labour is fo little, will fcarcely balance against the evils of fo extensive a cooperation. From what has been faid under this head it appears, that there will be a division of labour, if we compare the fociety in queftion with the flate of the folitaire and the favage. But it will produce an extensive compofition of labour, if we compare it with that to which we are at prefent accustomed in civilifed Europe.

* Smith's Wealth of Nations, Book I, Chap. I.

5 R 2

CHAP.

[ 860 ]

CHAP. VII.

OF THE OBJECTION TO THIS SYSTEM FROM THE PRINCIPLE OF POPULATION.

THE OBJECTION STATED.—REMOTENESS OF ITS OPERA-TION.—CONJECTURAL IDEAS RESPECTING THE ANTI-DOTE.—OMNIPOTENCE OF MIND.—ILLUSTRATIONS.— CAUSES OF DECREPITUDE.—YOUTH IS PROLONGED BY CHEARFULNESS—BY CLEARNESS OF APPREHENSION— AND A BENEVOLENT CHARACTER.—THE POWERS WE POSSESS ARE ESSENTIALLY PROGRESSIVE.—EFFECTS OF ATTENTION.—THE PHENOMENON OF SLEEP EXPLAINED. PRESENT UTILITY OF THESE REASONINGS.—APPLICA-TION TO THE FUTURE STATE OF SOCIETY.

The objection flated. A N author who has fpeculated widely upon fubjects of government *, has recommended equal, or, which was rather his idea, common property, as a complete remedy, to the ufurpation and diftrefs which are at prefent the most powerful enemics of human kind, to the vices which infect education in fome inftances, and the neglect it encounters in more, to all the turbulence of passion, and all the injustice of felfishness. But, after having exhibited this picture, not lefs true than delightful, he BOOK VIII. finds an argument that demolifhes the whole, and reftores him to indifference and defpair, in the exceffive population that would enfue.

* Wallace : Various Profpects of Mankind, Nature and Providence, 1761.
 2 having:

One of the most obvious answers to this objection is, that to Remotenels of its opera+ reason thus is to foresee difficulties at a great distance. Three tion. fourths of the habitable globe is now uncultivated. The parts already cultivated are capable of immeafurable improvement, Myriads of centuries of ftill increasing population may probably pafs away, and the earth ftill be found fufficient for the fubfiftence of its inhabitants. Who can fay how long the earth itfelf will furvive the cafualties of the planetary fyftem ? Who can fay what remedies shall suggest themselves for so distant an inconvenience, time enough for practical application, and of which we may yet at this time have not the fmalleft idea ? It would be truly abfurd for us to thrink from a tcheme of effential benefit to mankind, left they fhould be too happy, and by neceffary confequence at fome diftant period too populous.

But, though thefe remarks may be deemed a fufficient anfwer Conjectural ideas refrections to the objection, it may not be amifs to indulge in fome fpeculaing the antidot. may, to fpeak in the ftyle of one of the writers of the Christian Scriptures, "abide for ever *." It may be in danger of becoming too populous. A remedy may then be neceffary. If it may, * Ecclefiaftes, Chap. I, ver. 4.

CHAP.VII.

BOOK VIII. why fhould we fit down in fupine indifference and conclude that we can difcover no glimpfe of it? The difcovery, if made, would add to the firmnels and confiftency of our prospects; nor is it improbable to conjecture that that which would form the regulating fpring of our conduct then, might be the medium of a falutary modification now. What follows must be confidered in fome degree as a deviation into the land of conjecture. If it be falfe, it leaves the great fyftem to which it is appended in all found reafon as impregnable as ever. If this do not lead us to the true remedy, it does not follow that there is no remedy. The great object of enquiry will still remain open, however defective may be the fuggeftions that are now to be offered.

of mind.

3 6

6

Omnipotence Let us here return to the fublime conjecture of Franklin, that " mind will one day become omnipotent over matter "." If over all other matter, why not over the matter of our own bodies? If over matter at ever fo great a diftance, why not over matter which, however ignorant we may be of the tie that connects it with the thinking principle, we always carry about with us. and which is in all cafes the medium of communication between that principle and the external universe? In a word, why may not man be one day immortal ?

> * I have no other authority to quote for this expression than the conversation of Dr. Price. Upon enquiry I am happy to find it confirmed to me by Mr. William Morgan, the nephew of Dr Price, who recollects to have heard it repeatedly mentioned by his uncle.

> > The

The different cafes in which thought modifies the external BOOK VIII. univerfe are obvious to all. It is modified by our voluntary thoughts or defign. We defire to firetch out our hand, and it is firetched out. We perform a thousand operations of the fame fpecies every day, and their familiarity annihilates the wonder-They are not in themfelves lefs wonderful than any of those modifications which we are leaft accultomed to conceive.-Mind modifies body involuntarily. Emotion excited by fome unexpected word, by a letter that is delivered to us, occasions the most extraordinary revolutions in our frame, accelerates the circulation, caufes the heart to palpitate, the tongue to refuse its office, and has been known to occafion death by extreme anguith or extreme Thefe fymptoms we may either encourage or check. iov. Βv encouraging them habits are produced of fainting or of rage. To difcourage them is one of the principal offices of fortitude. The effort of mind in relifting pain in the ftories of Cranmer and Mucius Scævola is of the fame kind. It is reafonable to believe that that effort with a different direction might have cured certain difeafes of the fyftem. There is nothing indeed of which phyficians themfelves are more frequently aware, than of the power of the mind in affifting or retarding convalefcence.

Why is it that a mature man foon lofes that elafticity of limb, Caufes of decrepitude. which characterifes the heedlefs gaiety of youth? Becaufe he defifts from youthful habits. He affumes an air of dignity incom- . patible with the lightness of childish fallies. He is visited and vexed with all the cares that rife out of our miftaken inftitutions,

CHAP. VII.

Illustrations.

and

BOOK VIII. and his heart is no longer fatisfied and gay. Hence his limbs CHAP. VII. become fliff and unwieldy. This is the forerunner of old age and death.

Youth is prolonged by chearfulnefs : The first habit favourable to corporeal vigour is chearfulnefs. Every time that our mind becomes morbid, vacant and melancholy, a certain period is cut off from the length of our lives. Liftleffnefs of thought is the brother of death. But chearfulnefs gives new life to our frame and circulation to our juices. Nothing can long be stagnant in the frame of him, whose heart is tranquil, and his imagination active.

by clearness of apprehention : A fecond requifite in the cafe of which we treat is a clear and diffinct conception. If I know precifely what I wifh, it is eafy for me to calm the throbs of pain, and to affift the fluggifh operations of the fyftem. It is not a knowledge of anatomy, but a quiet and fleady attention to my fymptoms, that will beft enable me to correct the diffemper from which they fpring. Fainting is nothing elfe but a confusion of mind, in which the ideas appear to mix in painful diforder, and nothing is diffinguished.

and a benevolent charaeter. The true fource of chearfulnels is benevolence. To a youthful mind, while every thing ftrikes with its novelty, the individual fituation must be peculiarly unfortunate, if gaiety of thought be not produced, or, when interrupted, do not fpeedily return with its healing oblivion. But novelty is a fading charm, and perpetually decreases. Hence the approach of inanity and listlefinels liftleffnefs. After we have made a certain round, life delights no more. A deathlike apathy invades us. Thus the aged are generally cold and indifferent; nothing interefts their attention, or roufes the fluggifhnefs of their foul. How fhould it be otherwife? The purfuits of mankind are commonly frigid and contemptible, and the miftake comes at laft to be detected. But virtue is a charm that never fades. The foul that perpetually overflows with kindnefs and fympathy, will always be chearful. The man who is perpetually bufied in contemplations of public good, will always be active.

The application of thefe reafonings is fimple and irrefiftible. If mind be now in a great degree the ruler of the fyftem, why fhould it be incapable of extending its empire? If our involuntary thoughts can derange or reftore the animal economy, why fhould we not in procefs of time, in this as in other inflances, fubject the thoughts which are at prefent involuntary to the government of defign? If volition can now do fomething, why fhould it not go on to do fill more and more? There is no principle of reafon lefs liable to queftion than this, that, if we have in any refpect a little power now, and if mind be effentially progreffive, that power may, and, barring any extraordinary concuffions of nature, infallibly will, extend beyond any bounds we are able to preferibe to it.

Nothing can be more irrational and prefumptuous than to 5 S conclude,

The powers we poffefs are effentially progreffive,

BOOK VIII. CHAP. VII.

BOOK VIII. conclude, becaufe a certain fpecies of fuppofed power is entirely CHAP. VII. out of the line of our prefent observations, that it is therefore altogether beyond the limits of the human mind. We talk familiarly indeed of the limits of our faculties, but nothing is more difficult than to point them out. Mind, in a progreffive view at If it could have been told to the favage inhaleaft, is infinite. bitants of Europe in the times of Thefeus and Achilles, that man was capable of predicting eclipfes and weighing the air, of explaining the phenomena of nature fo that no prodigies should remain, of meafuring the diftance and the fize of the heavenly bodies, this would not have appeared to them lefs wonderful, than if we had told them of the poffible difcovery of the means of maintaining the human body in perpetual youth and vigour. But we have not only this analogy, flowing that the difcovery in queftion forms as it were a regular branch of the acquifitions that belong to an intellectual nature; but in addition to this we feem to have a glimple of the fpecific manner in which the acquifition will be fecured. Let us remark a little more diffinctly the fimplicity of the process.

Effects of attention.

We have called the principle of immortality in man chearfulnefs, clearnefs of conception and benevolence. Perhaps we fhall in fome refpects have a more accurate view of its potency, if we confider it as of the nature of attention. It is a very old maxim of practical conduct, that whatever is done with attention, is done well. It is becaufe this was a principal requifite, that many perfons fons endowed in an eminent degree with chearfulnefs, perfpica- BOOK VIII. city and benevolence, have perhaps not been longer lived than their neighbours. We are not capable at prefent of attending to every thing. A man who is engaged in the fublimeft and moft delightful exertions of mind, will perhaps be lefs attentive to his animal functions than his most ordinary neighbour, though he will frequently in a partial degree repair that neglect, by a more chearful and animated obfervation, when those exertions are fufpended. But, though the faculty of attention may at prefent have a very finall fhare of ductility, it is probable that it may be improved in that refpect to an inconceivable degree. The picture that was exhibited of the fubtlety of mind in an earlier ftage of this work *, gives to this fuppofition a certain degree of moral evidence. If we can have three hundred and twenty fucceffive ideas in a fecond of time, why fhould it be fuppofed that we fhall not hereafter arrive at the skill of carrying on a great number of contemporaneous proceffes without diforder ?

Having thus given a view of what may be the future improve- The phenoment of mind, it is proper that we fhould qualify this picture to fleep exthe fanguine temper of fome readers and the incredulity of others, by obferving that this improvement, if capable of being realifed. is however at a great diftance. A very obvious remark will render this eminently palpable. If an unintermitted attention to the animal economy be neceffary, then, before death can be banifhed,

> * Book IV, Chap. VII, p. 330. 5 S 2

menon of plained.

₩¢

BOOK VIII. CHAP.VII. we muft banish fleep, death's image. Sleep is one of the moft confpicuous infirmities of the human frame. It is not, as has often been fuppoled, a fulpenfion of thought, but an irregular and diffempered flate of the faculty *. Our tired attention refigns the helm, ideas fwim before us in wild confusion, and are attended with lefs and lefs diffinctnefs, till at length they leave no traces in the memory. Whatever attention and volition are then impofed upon us, as it were at unawares, are but faint refemblances of our operations in the fame kind when awake. Generally fpeaking, we contemplate fights of horror with little pain, and commit the moft atrocious crimes with little fenfe of their true nature. The horror we fometimes attribute to our dreams, will frequently be found upon accurate obfervation to belong to our review of them when we wake.

Prefent utility of thefe reafonings. One other remark may be proper in this place. If the remedies here preferibed tend to a total extirpation of the infirmities of our nature, then, though we cannot promife to them an early and complete fuccefs, we may probably find them of fome utility now. They may contribute to prolong our vigour, though not to immortalife it, and, which is of more confequence, to make us live while we live. Every time the mind is invaded with anguifh and gloom, the frame becomes difordered. Every time that languor and indifference creep upon us, our functions fall into decay. In proportion as we cultivate fortitude and equa-

* Book IV, Chap. VII, p. 335.

nimity,

nimity, our circulations will be chearful. In proportion as we BOOK VIII. cultivate a kind and benevolent propenfity, we may be fecure of CHAP. VII. finding fomething for ever to intereft and engage us.

Medicine may reafonably be flated to confift of two branchesthe animal and intellectual. The latter of these has been infinitely too much neglected. It cannot be employed to the purpofes of a profeffion; or, where it has been incidentally fo employed, it has been artificially and indirectly, not in an open and avowed manner. "Herein the patient muft minifter to himfelf *." How often do we find a fudden piece of good news diffipating a diftemper? How common is the remark, that those accidents, which are to the indolent a fource of difease, are forgotten and extirpated in the bufy and active ? It would no doubt be of extreme moment to us, to be thoroughly acquainted with the power of motives, habit, and what is called. refolution, in this refpect. I walk twenty miles in an indolent and half determined temper, and am extremely fatigued. I walk twenty miles full of ardour and with a motive that engroffes my foul, and I come in as fresh and alert as when I began my journey. We are fick and we die, generally fpeaking, becaufe we confent to fuffer these accidents. This confent in the prefent ftate of mankind is in fome degree unavoidable. We muft have ftronger motives and clearer views, before we can uniformly refufe it. But, though we cannot always, we may frequently refuse. This is a truth of which all mankind are-

* Macbeth, Act V.

to

BOOK VIII. to a certain degree aware. Nothing more common than for the moft ignorant man to call upon his fick neighbour, to roufe himfelf, not to fuffer himfelf to be conquered; and this exhortation is always accompanied with fome confcioufnefs of the efficacy of refolution. The wife and the good man therefore fhould carry with him the recollection of what chearfulnefs and a determined fpirit are able to do, of the capacity with which he is endowed of expelling the feeds and firft flight appearances of indifpofition.

> The principal part of the preceding paragraph is nothing more than a particular application of what was elfewhere delivered refpecting moral and phyfical caufes *. It would have been eafy to have caft the prefent chapter in a different form, and to have made it a chapter upon health, flowing that one of the advantages of a better flate of fociety would be a very high improvement of the vigour and animal conflictution of man. In that cafe the conjecture of immortality would only have come in as an incidental remark, and the whole would have affumed lefs the air of conjecture than of clofe and argumentative deduction. But it was perhaps better to give the fubject the moft explicit form, at the rifk of exciting a certain degree of prejudice.

Application to the future state of fociety.

a come an

870

To apply these remarks to the subject of population. The tendency of a cultivated and virtuous mind is to render us indifferent to the gratifications of sense. They please at present * Book I, Chap. VII, Part I.

by their novelty, that is, becaufe we know not how to BOOK VIII. eftimate them. They decay in the decline of life indirectly becaufe the fystem refuses them, but directly and principally becaufe they no longer excite the ardour and paffion of mind, It is well known that an inflamed imagination is capable of doubling and tripling the feminal fecretions. The gratifications of fenfe pleafe at prefent by their impofture. We foon learn to defpife the mere animal function, which, apart from the delufions of intellect, would be nearly the fame in all cafes; and to value it, only as it happens to be relieved by perfonal charms or mental excellence. We abfurdly imagine that no better road can be found to the fympathy and intercourfe of minds. But a very flight degree of attention might convince us that this is a falfe road, full of danger and deception. Why fhould I efteem, another, or by another be efteemed ? For this reafon only, becaufe efteem is due, and only fo far as it is due.

The men therefore who exift when the earth fhall refufe itfelf to a more extended population, will ceafe to propagate, for they will no longer have any motive, either of error or duty, to induce them. In addition to this they will perhaps be immortal. The whole will be a people of men, and not of children. Generation will not fucceed generation, nor truth have in a certain degree to recommence her career at the end of every thirty years. There will be no war, no crimes, no adminiftration of juffice as it is called, and no government. Thefe latter latter articles are at no great diftance; and it is not impoffible that fome of the prefent race of men may live to fee them in part accomplifhed. But befide this, there will be no difeafe, no anguish, no melancholy and no refentment. Every man will feek with ineffable ardour the good of all. Mind will be active and eager, yet never difappointed. Men will fee the progreffive advancement of virtue and good, and feel that, if things occafionally happen contrary to their hopes, the mifcarriage itfelf was a neceffary part of that progrefs. They will know, that they are members of the chain, that each has his feveral utility, and they will not feel indifferent to that utility. They will be eager to enquire into the good that already exifts, the means by which it was produced, and the greater good that is yet in flore. They will never want motives for exertion; for that benefit which a man thoroughly underftands and earneftly loves, he cannot refrain from endeavouring to promote.

BOOK VIII. CHAP. VII.

872

Before we difmifs this fubject it is proper once again to remind the reader, that the leading doctrine of this chapter is given only as matter of probable conjecture, and that the grand argument of this division of the work is altogether independent of its truth or falfhood.

CHAP.

[ 873 ]

CH, AP. VIII.

OF THE MEANS OF INTRODUCING THE GENUINE SYSTEM OF PROPERTY.

APPREHENSIONS THAT ARE ENTERTAINED ON THIS SUB-JECT .---- IDEA OF MASSACRE.---- INFERENCE WE OUGHT TO MAKE UPON SUPPOSITION OF THE REALITY OF THESE APPREHENSIONS .--- MISCHIEF BY NO MEANS THE NECES-SARY ATTENDANT ON IMPROVEMENT .--- DUTIES UNDER THIS CIRCUMSTANCE, I. OF THOSE WHO ARE QUALIFIED FOR PUBLIC INSTRUCTORS - TEMPER - SINCERITY. PERNICIOUS EFFECTS OF DISSIMULATION IN THIS CASE.----2. OF THE RICH AND GREAT .- MANY OF THEM MAY BE EXPECTED TO BE ADVOCATES OF EQUALITY .-- CONDUCT WHICH THEIR INTEREST AS A BODY PRESCRIBES .--- 3. OF THE FRIENDS OF EQUALITY IN GENERAL .- OMNIPO-TENCE OF TRUTH. -- IMPORTANCE OF A MILD AND BENEVOLENT PROCEEDING .-- CONNEXION BETWEEN LI-BERTY AND EQUALITY .- CAUSE OF EQUALITY WILL PERPETUALLY ADVANCE .- SYMPTOMS OF ITS PROGRESS. --- IDEA OF ITS FUTURE SUCCESS .-- CONCLUSION.

AVING thus flated explicitly and without referve the BOOK VIII. great branches of this illuftricus picture, there is but one

 $5 \mathrm{T}$ fubject'

OF THE MEANS OF INTRODUCING

BOOK VIII. fubject that remains. In what manner fhall this intereffing im-PHAP. VIII. provement of human fociety be carried into execution? Are there not certain fteps that are defirable for this purpole? Are there not certain fteps that are inevitable? Will not the period that muft first elapfe, neceffarily be ftained with a certain infusion of evil?

Apprehenfions that are entertained on this fubject. No idea has excited greater horror in the minds of a multitude of perfons, than that of the mifchiefs that are to enfue from the diffemination of what they call levelling principles. They believe "that thefe principles will inevitably ferment in the minds of the vulgar, and that the attempt to carry them intoexecution will be attended with every fpecies of calamity." They reprefent to themfelves "the uninformed and uncivilifed part of mankind, as let loofe from all reftraint, and hurried intoevery kind of excefs. Knowledge and tafte, the improvements of intellect, the difcoveries of fages, the beauties of poetry and art, are trampled under foot and extinguished by barbarians. It is another inundation of Goths and Vandals, with this bitter aggravation, that the viper that ftings us to death was warmed in our own bofoms."

They conceive of the fcene as "beginning in maffacre." They fuppofe "all that is great, preeminent and illuftrious as ranking among the first victims. Such as are diftinguished by peculiar elegance of manners or energy of diction and compofition, fition, will be the inevitable objects of envy and jealoufy. Such BOOK VIII. as intrepidly exert themfelves to fuccour the perfecuted, or to declare to the public those truths which they are least inclined, but which are most neceffary for them to hear, will be marked out for affaffination."

THE GENUINE SYSTEM OF PROPERTY.

Let us not, from any partiality to the fystem of equality Idea of maffacre delineated in this book, fhrink from the picture here exhibited. Maffacre is the too poffible attendant upon revolution, and maffacre is perhaps the most hateful fcene, allowing for its momentary duration, that any imagination can fuggeft. The fearful, hopelefs expectation of the defeated, and the bloodhound fury of their conquerors, is a complication of milchief that all which has been told of infernal regions cannot furpafs. The cold-blooded maffacres that are perpetrated under the name of criminal justice fall short of these in their most frightful aggravations. The minifters and inftruments of law have by cuftom reconciled their minds to the dreadful tafk they perform. and bear their refpective parts in the most shocking enormities. without being fenfible to the paffions allied to those enormities. But the inftruments of maffacre are actuated with all the fentiments of fiends. Their eyes emit flashes of cruelty and rage. They purfue their victims from ftreet to ftreet and from houfe to They tear them from the arms of their fathers and their houfe. wives. They glut themfelves with barbarity and infult, and utter fhouts of horrid joy at the fpectacle of their tortures.

5 T 2

We

OF THE MEANS OF INTRODUCING

BOOK VIII. CHAP. VIII.

876

Inference we ought to make upon fuppofition of the reality of thefe apprehenfions.

We have now contemplated the tremendous picture; what is the conclusion it behaves us to draw? Muft we thrink from reafon. from juffice, from virtue and happines? Suppose that the inevitable confequence of communicating truth were the temporary introduction of fuch a fcene as has just been defcribed, must we on that account refuse to communicate it ? The crimes that were perpetrated would in no just estimate appear to be the refult of truth, but of the error which had previously been infused. The impartial enquirer would behold them as the laft ftruggles of expiring defpotifm, which, if it had furvived, would have produced mifchiefs, fcarcely lefs atrocious in the hour of their commiffion, and infinitely more calamitous by the length of their duration. If we would judge truly, even admitting the unfavourable fupposition above stated, we must contrast a moment of horror and diffrefs with ages of felicity. No imagination can fufficiently conceive the mental' improvement and the tranquil virtue that would fucceed, were property once permitted to reft upon its genuine bafis.

And by what means fupprefs truth, and keep alive the falutary intoxication, the tranquillifung infanity of mind which fome men defire? Such has been too generally the policy of government through every age of the world. Have we flaves? We muft affiduoufly retain them in ignorance. Have we colonies and dependencies? The great effort of our care is to keep them from being too populous and profperous. Have we fubjects? It is

" by

THE GENUINE SYSTEM OF PROPERTY.

" by impotence and mifery that we endeavour to render them BOOK VIII. CHAP, VIII. fupple: plenty is fit for nothing but to make them unmanageable, difobedient and mutinous *." If this were the true philofophy of focial inftitutions, well might we fhrink from it with horror. How tremendous an abortion would the human fpecies be found, if all that tended to make them wife, tended to make them unprincipled and profligate? But this it is impoffible for any one to believe, who will lend the fubject a moment's impartial confideration. Can truth, the perception of juffice and a defire to execute it, be the fource of irretrievable ruin to mankind ? It may be conceived that the first opening and illumination of mind will be attended with diforder. But every just reasoner must confess that regularity and happiness will succeed to this confusion. To refuse the remedy, were this picture of its operation ever fo true, would be as if a man who had diflocated a limb, fhould refuse to undergo the pain of having it replaced. If mankind have hitherto loft the road of virtue and happinefs, that can be no just reafon why they flould be fuffered to go wrong for ever. We must not refuse a conviction of error, or even the treading over again fome of the fleps that were the refult of it.

Another queftion fuggefts itfelf under this head. Can we fupprefs truth? Can we arreft the progrefs of the enquiring mind? If we can, it will only be done by the moft unmitigated defpotifm. Mind has a perpetual tendency to rife. It cannot be held * Book V, Chap. III, p. 405.

dówn

OF THE MEANS OF INTRODUCING

BOOK VIII. CHAP. VIII. down but by a power that counteracts its genuine tendency through every moment of its exiftence. Tyrannical and fanguinary muft be the meafures employed for this purpofe. Miferable and difguftful muft be the fcene they produce. Their refult will be thick darknefs of the mind, timidity, fervility, hypocrify. This is the alternative, fo far as there is any alternative in their power, between the oppofite meafures of which the princes and governments of the earth have now to choofe : they muft either fupprefs enquiry by the moft arbitrary ftretches of power, or preferve a clear and tranquil field in which every man fhall be at liberty to difcover and vindicate his opinion.

No doubt it is the duty of governments to maintain the moft unalterable neutrality in this important transaction. No doubt it is the duty of individuals to publish truth without diffidence or referve, to publish it in its genuine form without feeking aid from the meretricious arts of publication. The more it is told, the more it is known in its true dimensions, and not in parts, the lefs is it possible that it should coalesce with or leave room for the pernicious effects of error. The true philanthropist will be eager, instead of supprefsing discussion, to take an active share in the scene, to exert the full strength of his faculties in discovery, and to contribute by his exertions to render the operation of thought at once perfpicuous and profound.

Michief by FO means the It being then fufficiently evident that truth muft be told at whatever whatever expence, let us proceed to confider the precife amount BOOK VIII. of that expence, to enquire how much of confusion and violence is infeparable from the transit which mind has to accomplish. And here it plainly appears that mifchief is by no means infeparable from the progrefs. In the mere circumstance of our acquiring knowledge and accumulating one truth after another there is no direct tendency to diforder. Evil can only fpring from the clash of mind with mind, from one body of men in the community outfripping another in their ideas of improvement, and becoming impatient of the oppofition they have to encounter.

THE GENUINE SYSTEM OF PROPERTY.

In this interefting period, in which mind shall arrive as it Duties under were at the true crifis of its ftory, there are high duties incumbent upon every branch of the community. First, upon those are qualified cultivated and powerful minds, that are fitted to be precurfors to infructors: the reft in the difcovery of truth. They are bound to be active, indefatigable and difinterefted. It is incumbent upon them to temperate abitain from inflammatory language, from all expressions of acrimony and refentment. It is abfurd in any government to erect itfelf into a court of criticism in this respect, and to establish a criterion of liberality and decorum; but for that very reason it. is doubly incumbent on those who communicate their thoughts to the public, to exercife a rigid cenfure over themfelves. The tidings of liberty and equality are tidings of good will to all or -ders of men. They free the peafant from the iniquity that depreffes .

CHAP. VIII. neceffary attendant on improvement.

this circumthofe who for public

OF THE MEANS OF INTRODUCING

BOOK VIII. prefies his mind, and the privileged from the luxury and defpotifm by which he is corrupted. Let there who bear there tidings not flain their benignity, by flowing that that benignity has not yet become the inmate of their hearts.

Nor is it lefs neceffary that they fhould be urged to tell the fincerity. whole truth without difguife. No maxim can be more pernicious than that which would teach us to confult the temper of the times, and to tell only fo much as we imagine our contemporaries will be able to bear. This practice is at prefent almost univerfal, and it is the mark of a very painful degree of depravity. We retail and mangle truth. We impart it to our fellows, not with the liberal meafure with which we have received it, but with fuch parfimony as our own miferable prudence may chance to prefcribe. We pretend that truths fit to be practifed in one country, nay, truths which we confess to be eternally right, are not fit to be practifed in another. That we may deceive others with a tranquil confcience, we begin with deceiving ourfelves. We put fhackles upon our minds, and dare not truft ourfelves at large in the purfuit of truth. This practice took its commencement from the machinations of party, and the defire of one wife and adventurous leader to carry a troop of weak, timid and felfifh fupporters in his train. There is no reafon why I fhould not declare in any affembly upon the face of the earth that I am a republican. There is no more reafon why, being a republican under a monarchical government, I fhould enter into a desperate a defperate faction to invade the public tranquillity, than if I noor you were monarchical under a republic. Every community of men. as well as every individual, must govern itself according to its ideas of juffice. What I should defire is, not by violence to change its inftitutions, but by reafon to change its ideas. I have no bufinefs with factions or intrigae; but fimply to promulgate the truth, and to wait the tranquil progress of conviction. If there be any affembly that cannot bear this, of fuch an affembly I ought to be no member. It happens much oftener than we are willing to imagine, that " the post of honour," or, which is better, the post of utility, " is a private station *."

$80

THE GENUINE SYSTEM OF PROPERTY.

The diffimulation here cenfured, befide its ill effects upon him Pernicious who practifes it, and by degrading and unnerving his character upon fociety at large, has a particular ill confequence with refpect to the point we are confidering. It lays a mine, and prepares an explosion. This is the tendency of all unnatural restraint. Meanwhile the unfettered progress of truth is always falutary. Its advances are gradual, and each ftep prepares the general mind for that which is to follow. They are fudden and unprepared emanations of truth, that have the greatest tendency to deprive men of their fobriety and felf command. Referve in this refpect is calculated at once, to give a rugged and angry tone to the multitude whenever they shall happen to discover what is thus conecaled, and to millead the depolitaries of political power. It effects of diffimulation in this eafe.

* Addifon's Cato, Act IV.

fooths

CHAP VIII.

OF THE MEANS OF INTRODUCING

BOOK VIII. fooths them into falfe fecurity, and prompts them to maintain an inaufpicious obflinacy.

2. Of the rich and great.

Many of them may be expected to be advocates of equality.

Having confidered what it is that belongs in fuch a crifis to the enlightened and wife, let us next turn our attention to a very different class of fociety, the rich and great. And here in the first place it may be remarked, that it is a very false calculation that leads us univerfally to defpair of having thefe for the advocates of equality. Mankind are not fo miferably felfifh, as fatirists and courtiers have supposed. We never engage in any action without enquiring what is the decifion of juffice refpecting it. We are at all times anxious to fatisfy ourfelves that what our inclinations lead us to do, is innocent and right to be done. * Since therefore juffice occupies fo large a fhare in the contemplations of the human mind, it cannot reafonably be doubted that a ftrong and commanding view of juffice would prove a powerful motive to influence our choice. But that virtue which for whatever reafon we have chofen, foon becomes recommended to us by a thousand other reasons. We find in it reputation. eminence, felf complacence and the divine pleafures of an approving mind.

The rich and great are far from callous to views of general felicity, when fuch views are brought before them with that evidence

* Book II, Chap. III, p. 98.

THE GENUINE SYSTEM OF PROPERTY.

evidence and attraction of which they are fusceptible. From one dreadful difadvantage their minds are free. They have not been foured with unrelenting tyranny, or narrowed by the perpetual preffure of diffrefs. They are peculiarly qualified to judge of the emptinels of that pomp and those gratifications. which are always most admired when they are feen from a diffance. They will frequently be found confiderably indifferent to these things, unless confirmed by habit and rendered inveterate by age. If you flow them the attractions of gallantry and magnanimity in refigning them, they will often be refigned without reluctance. Wherever accident of any fort has introduced an active mind, there enterprife is a neceffary confequence; and there are few perfons fo inactive, as to fit down for ever in the fupine enjoyment of the indulgences to which they were born. The fame fpirit that has led forth the young nobility of fucceffive ages to encounter the hardfhips of a camp. might eafily be employed to render them champions of the caufe of equality: nor is it to be believed, that the circumftance of fuperior virtue and truth in this latter exertion, will be without its effect.

But let us fuppofe a confiderable party of the rich and great conduct to be actuated by no view but to their emolument and eafe. is not difficult to flow them, that their intereft in this fenfe will feribes. admit of no more than a temperate and yielding refistance. Much no doubt of the future tranquillity or confusion of man-which their It intereft as a body pre-kind

5 U 2

BOOK VIIL CHAP, VIII.

OF THE MEANS OF INTRODUCING

BOOK VIII. CHAP. VIII.

kind depends upon the conduct of this party. To them I would fay: "It is in vain for you to fight against truth. It is like endeavouring with the human hand to ftop the inroad of the Retire betimes. Seek your fafety in concession. Tf ocean. you will not go over to the flandard of political juffice. temporife at leaft with an enemy whom you cannot overcome. Much, inexpreffibly much depends upon you. If you be wife, if you be prudent, if you would fecure at leaft your lives and your perfonal eafe amidst the general shipwreck of monopoly and folly, you will be unwilling to irritate and defy. Unlefs by your rafhnefs, there will be no confusion, no murder, not a drop of blood will be fpilt, and you will yourfelves be made happy. If you brave the ftorm and call down every fpecies of odium on your heads, still it is possible, still it is to be hoped that the general tranquillity may be maintained. But, fhould it prove otherwife, you will have principally to answer for all the confequences that fhall enfue.

"Above all, do not be lulled into a rafh and headlong fecurity. We have already feen how much the hypocrify and inftability of the wife and enlightened of the prefent day, those who confess much, and have a confused view of ftill more, but dare not examine the whole with a fleady and unfhrinking eye, are calculated to increase this fecurity. But there is a danger ftill more palpable. Do not be misled by the unthinking and feeming general cry of those who have no fixed principles.

THE GENUINE SYSTEM OF PROPERTY.

Addreffes have been found in every age a very uncertain criterion of the future conduct of a people. Do not count upon the numerous train of your adherents, retainers and fervants. They afford a very feeble dependence. They are men, and cannot be dead to the interefts and claims of mankind. Some of them will adhere to you as long as a fordid intereft feems to draw them in that direction. But the moment yours fhall appear to be the lofing caufe, the fame intereft will carry them over to the enemy's flandard. They will difappear like the morning dew.

"May I not hope that you are capable of receiving impreffion from another argument? Will you feel no compunction at the thought of refifting the greatest of all benefits? Are you content to be regarded by the most enlightened of your contemporaries, and to be handed down to the remoteft pofferity, as the obftinate adverfaries of philanthropy and juffice ? Can you reconcile it to your own minds, that, for a fordid interest, for the caufe of general corruption and abufe, you should be found active in flifling truth, and ftrangling the new born happinefs of mankind?" Would to God it were poffible to carry home this argument to the enlightened and accomplifhed advocates of ariftocracy ! Would to God they could be perfuaded to confult neither paffion, nor prejudice, nor the flights of imagination, in deciding upon fo momentous a queftion ! " We know that truth does not ftand in need of your alliance to fecure her triumph. We do not fear your enmity. But our hearts bleed to fee fuch gailantry

۰.

OF THE MEANS OF INTRODUCING

ed -

CHAP. VIII. gallantry fuch talents and fuch virtue enflaved to prejudice, and enlifted in error. It is for your fakes that we expostulate, and for the honour of human nature."

3. of the friends of cquality in general. Omnipotence of truth.

To the general mass of the adherents of the cause of justice it " If there be any force in may be proper to fay a few words. the arguments of this work, thus much at least we are authorifed to deduce from them, that truth is irrefiftible. If man be endowed with a rational nature, then whatever is clearly demonftrated to his underftanding to have the most powerful recommendations, fo long as that clearnefs is prefent to his mind, will inevitably engage his choice. It is to no purpose to fay that mind is fluctuating and fickle; for it is fo only in proportion as evidence is imperfect. Let the evidence be increafed, and the perfuafion will be made firmer, and the choice more uniform. It is the nature of individual mind to be perpetually adding to the flock of its ideas and knowledge. Similar to this is the nature of general mind, exclusively of cafualties which, arising from a more comprehensive order of things, appear to diffurb the order of limited fystems. This is confirmed to us, if a truth of this univerfal nature can derive confirmation from partial experiments, by the regular advances of the human mind from century to century, fince the invention of printing.

Importance of a mild and benevolent proceeding. " Let then this axiom of the omnipotence of truth be the rudder of our undertakings. Let us not precipitately endeavour to accomplish that to-day, which the differination of truth will make

THE GENUINE SYSTEM OF PROPERTY.

make unavoidable to-morrow. Let us not anxioufly watch for BOOK VIII. occafions and events : the afcendancy of truth is independent of events. Let us anxioufly refrain from violence: force is not conviction, and is extremely unworthy of the caufe of juffice. Let us admit into our bofoms neither contempt, animofity, refentment nor revenge. The caufe of juffice is the caufe of humanity. Its advocates fhould overflow with univerfal good will. We fhould love this caufe, for it conduces to the general happinefs of mankind. We should love it, for there is not a man that lives, who in the natural and tranquil progrefs of things will not be made happier by its approach. The most powerful caufe by which it has been retarded, is the miltake of its adherents, the air of ruggednefs, brutifhnefs and inflexibility which they have given to that which in itfelf is all benignity. Nothing lefs than this could have prevented the great mafs of enquirers from beflowing upon it a patient examination. Be it the care of the now increasing advocates of equality to remove this obflacle to the fuccefs of their caufe. We have but two plain duties, which, if we fet out right, it is not eafy to miftake. The first is an unwearied attention to the great inftrument of juffice, reafon. We must divulge our fentiments with the utmost frankness. We must endeavour to impress them upon the minds of others. In this attempt we must give way to no discouragement. We must fharpen our intellectual weapons; add to the flock of our knowledge; be pervaded with a fenfe of the magnitude of our caufe; and perpetually increase that calm prefence of mind and felf poffeffion

887

BOOK VIII. feffion which muft enable us to do juffice to our principles. Our fecond duty is tranquillity."

Connexion between liberty and equality.

888

It will not be right to pass over a question that will inevitably fuggest itself to the mind of the reader. " If an equalifation of property be to take place, not by law, regulation or public inftitution, but only through the private conviction of individuals, in what mannershall it begin?" In anfwering this question it is not necessary to prove fo fimple a proposition, as that all republicanism, all equalifation of ranks and immunities, flrongly tends towards an equalifation of property. Thus, in Sparta this laft principle was completely admitted. In Athens the public largeffes were fo great as almost to exempt the citizens from manual labour; and the rich and eminent only purchafed a toleration for their advantages, by the liberal manner in which they opened their ftores to the pub-In Rome, agrarian laws, a wretched and ill chofen fubftitute lic. for equality, but which grew out of the fame fpirit, were perpetually agitated. If men go on to increase in discernment, and this they certainly will with peculiar rapidity, when the ill-con-Aructed governments which now retard their progrefs are removed, the fame arguments which showed them the injustice of ranks, will fhow them the injuffice of one man's wanting that, which while it is in the pofferfion of another, conduces in no respect to his well being.

Caufe of equality will It is a common error to imagine, that this injustice will be felt only only by the lower orders who fuffer from it; and hence it would BOOK VIII appear that it can only be corrected by violence. But in anfwer to this it may in the first place be observed that all fuffer from it, advance. the rich who engrofs, as well as the poor who want. Secondly, it has been clearly flown in the course of the prefent work, that men are not fo entirely governed by felf intereft as has frequently It has been fhown, if poffible, ftill more been fuppofed. clearly, that the felfifh are not governed folely by fenfual gratification or the love of gain, but that the defire of eminence and diffinction is in different degrees an universal paffion. Thirdly and principally, the progress of truth is the most powerful of all caufes. Nothing can be more abfurd than to imagine that theory, in the beft fense of the word, is not effentially connected with practice. That which we can be perfuaded clearly and diffinctly to approve, will inevitably modify our conduct. Mind is not an aggregate of various faculties contending with each other for the maftery, but on the contrary the will is in all cafes. correspondent to the last judgment of the understanding. When: men shall diffinctly and habitually perceive the folly of luxury, and when their neighbours are impreffed with a fimilar difdain, it will be impoffible that they fhould purfue the means of it with the fame avidity as before.

THE GENUINE SYSTEM OF PROPERTY

It will not be difficult perhaps to trace, in the progrefs of Symptoms. of its promodern Europe from barbarism to refinement, a tendency gress. towards the equalifation of property. In the feudal times, as

5 X.

CHAP VIII perpetually

889

now

BOOK VIII. now in India and other parts of the world, men were born to CHAP. VIII. a certain flation, and it was nearly impoffible for a peafant to rife to the rank of a noble. Except the nobles there were no men that were rich; for commerce, either external or internal, had fcarcely an existence. Commerce was one engine for throwing down this feemingly impregnable barrier, and flocking the prejudices of nobles, who were fufficiently willing to believe that their retainers were a different fpecies of beings from themfelves. Learning was another, and more powerful engine. In all ages of the church we fee men of the bafeft origin rifing to the higheft eminence. Commerce proved that others could rife to wealth befide those who were cafed in mail; but learning proved that the low-born were capable of furpaffing their lords. The progreffive effect of these ideas may eafily be traced by the attentive obferver. Long after learning began to unfold its powers, its votaries still submitted to those obsequious manners and fervile dedications, which no man reviews at the prefent day without aftonishment. It is but lately that men have known that intellectual excellence can accomplifh its purpofes without a patron. At prefent, among the civilifed and well informed a man of flender wealth, but of great intellectual powers and a firm and virtuous mind, is conftantly received with attention and deference; and his purfe-proud neighbour who fhould attempt to treat him fupercilioufly, is fure to be difcountenanced in his usurpation. The inhabitants of diffant villages, where long eftablished prejudices are flowly deftroyed, would be affonifhed aftonifhed to fee how comparatively fmall a fhare wealth has in CHAP. VIII. determining the degree of attention with which men are treated in enlightened circles.

890

THE GENUINE SYSTEM OF PROPERTY.

These no doubt are but flight indications. It is with morality Idea of its future fuccefs. in this refpect as it is with politics. The progrefs is at first fo flow as for the most part to elude the observation of mankind; nor can it indeed be adequately perceived but by the contemplation and comparison of events during a confiderable portion of time. After a certain interval, the fcene is more fully unfolded, and the advances appear more rapid and decifive. While wealth was every thing, it was to be expected that men would acquire it, though at the expence of character and integrity. Abfolute and univerfal truth had not yet fhown itfelf fo decidedly, as to be able to enter the lifts with what dazzled the eye or gratified In proportion as the monopolies of ranks and comthe fenfe. panies are abolifhed, the value of fuperfluities will not fail to decline. In proportion as republicanism gains ground, men will come to be effimated for what they are, not for what force has given, and force may take away.

Let us reflect for a moment on the gradual confequences of this revolution of opinion. Liberality of dealing will be among its earlieft refults, and of confequence accumulation will become lefs frequent and lefs enormous. Men will not be difpofed, as now, to take advantage of each other's diffreffes, and to demand a price-'

5 X 2

891

BOOK VIII. CHAP. VIII.

892

a price for their aid, not meafured by a general flandard, but by the wants of an individual. They will not confider how much they can extort, but how much it is reafonable to require. The mafter tradefman who employs labourers under him, will be disposed to give a more ample reward to their industry; which he is at prefent enabled to tax chiefly by the neutral circumftance of having provided a capital. Liberality on the part of his employer will complete in the mind of the artifan, what ideas of political juffice will probably have begun. He will no longer fpend the little furplus of his earnings in that diffipation, which is at prefent one of the principal caufes that fubject him to the arbitrary pleafure of a fuperior. He will escape from the irrefolution of flavery and the fetters of despair. and perceive that independence and eafe are fcarcely lefs within his reach than that of any other member of the community. This is a natural flep towards the ftill farther progreffion, in which the labourer will receive entire whatever the confumer may be required to pay, without having a middle man, an idle and ufeless monopolifer, as he will then be found, to fatten upon his fpoils.

The fame fentiments that lead to liberality of dealing, will alfo lead to liberality of diffribution. The trader, who is unwilling to grow rich by extorting from his employer or his workmen, will alfo refuse to become rich by the not inferior injuffice of withholding from his poor neighbour the fupply he wants. Wants. The habit which was created in the former cafe of BOOK VIII. being contented with moderate gains, is closely connected with the habit of being contented with flender accumulation. He that is not anxious to add to his heap, will not be reluctant by a benevolent distribution to prevent its increase. Wealth was once almost the fingle object of purfuit that prefented itself to the grofs and uncultivated mind. Various objects will hereafter divide men's attention, the love of liberty, the love of equality, the purfuits of art and the defire of knowledge. These objects will not, as now, be confined to a few, but will gradually be laid open to all. The love of liberty obvioufly leads to the love of man: the fentiment of benevolence will be increased, and the narrownels of the felfish affections will decline. The general diffusion of truth will be productive of general improvement; and men will daily approximate towards those views according to which every object will be appreciated at its true value. Add to which, that the improvement of which we fpeak is general, not individual. The progrefs is the progrefs of all. Each man will find his fentiments of juffice and rectitude echoed, encouraged and ftrengthened by the fentiments of his neighbours. Apoftacy will be made eminently improbable, becaufe the apoftate will incur, not only his own cenfure, but the cenfure of every beholder.

One remark will fuggeft itfelf upon these confiderations. "If Conclusion. 2 the BOOK VIII. CHAP. VIII. the inevitable progrefs of improvement infenfibly lead towards an equalifation of property, what need was there of proposing it as a fpecific object to men's confideration ?" The anfwer to this objection is eafy. The improvement in queftion confifts in a knowledge of truth. But our knowledge will be very imperfect fo long as this great branch of universal justice fails to conftitute a part of it. All truth is useful; can this truth, which is perhaps more fundamental than any, be without its benefits ? Whatever be the object towards which mind fpontaneoufly advances, it is of no mean importance to us to have a diffinct view of that object. Our advances will thus become accelerated. It is a well known principle of morality, that he who propofes perfection to himfelf, though he will inevitably fall fhort of what he . purfues, will make a more rapid progrefs, than he who is contented to aim only at what is imperfect. The benefits to be derived in the interval from a view of equalifation, as one of the great objects towards which we are tending, are exceedingly confpicuous. Such a view will firongly conduce to make us difinterefted now. It will teach us to look with contempt upon mercantile fpeculations, commercial profperity, and the cares of gain. It will imprefs us with a just apprehenfion of what it is of which man is capable and in which his perfection confifts; and will fix our ambition and activity upon the worthieft objects. Mind cannot arrive at any great and illustrious attainment, however much the nature of mind may carry carry us towards it, without feeling fome prefages of its approach; and it is reafonable to believe that, the earlier thefe prefages are introduced, and the more diffinct they are made, the more aufpicious will be the event.

THE GENUINE SYSTEM OF PROPERTY.

FINIS.

~ *

